A labor strike is an unequal contest at best. It is a contest of endurance between the hunger and thirst of the human stomach and the income of capital. Capital in such contests loses none of its accumulation of wealth, unless an industry itself should be destroyed, and in such case labor would be the greatest sufferer. The income of capital would be temporarily lessened. That would be all. The existence of labor itself is dependent upon constant employment, and its condition can not be improved by idleness or by lawless violence or a disregard of the rights of any law-abiding citizen.

The obligations of both capitalists and laborers, like that of all citizens, is to promote the general welfare, or at least to do nothing to its injury. The paramount object in the establishment and maintenance of free government is to promote the general welfare. Some method of profit sharing between employer and employee that would secure a harmonious cooperation of both, so as to prevent labor strikes and improve the condition of labor, is of vital importance to the general welfare; for the pillars of the Republic rest upon the comfort of the home and the happiness of the fireside of labor. [Loud applause.]

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, if no one else desires to debate the resolution, I move that the committee rise and report it to the House and recommend its adoption.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LACEY, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House resolution 340, and had directed him to report the same back without amendment, and with the recommendation that the resolution be agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PURE FOOD.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the following order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That House bill No. 3109, a bill for preventing the adulteration, misbranding, and imitation of foods, beverages, candies, drugs, and condiments, in the District of Columbia and the Territories, and for regulating interstate traffic therein, and for other purposes, be the special and continuing order until finally disposed of: Provided, however, That the consideration of said bill shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills, conference reports, or special orders, or other subjects given privilege under the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we would like to have some statement of what this bill is, and what its object is. I could not understand it from the reading of the order.

Mr. HEPBURN. This bill, Mr. Speaker, has been on the Calendar since the 2d day of April last. Substantially it has been reported to two or three Congresses. It is the pure-food bill. It is a bill that has been recommended, in the main, by the three or four pure-food congresses that have assembled annually in this city. It has received a great deal of attention. For days and weeks it was the subject of consideration by the Interstate Commerce Committee. Hearings were had on the bill for weeks, and from all parts of the country persons in interest, scientists, and others, were heard before that committee. The hearings are voluminous and have been in print now for nearly a year, and I hope there will be no objection to fixing a time for the consideration of the matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this bill has the unanimous report of his committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. There are two gentlemen who have filed their views as a minority.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Are those gentlemen in the Hall at present?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think that one of them is now in the city. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] was here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like——

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think there is any objection on the part of either of those gentlemen.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Has the gentleman notified those gentlemen that he desired to ask unanimous consent for the passage of this order?

Mr. HEPBURN. No; I have not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman states that he is satisfied that the gentlemen who filed the views of the minority have no objection to this order, I have no objection.

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not speak about the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS]; I think he is not in the city. But the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], I am quite sure, has no objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. In the absence of the members of the minority——

Mr. HEPBURN. There are gentlemen of the minority here. This is asking for an order to fix a time for the consideration of what we call the pure-food bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I could not hear the colloquy between the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think there is any objection.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think that a request of this kind ought to be made on the part of the committee. Have the members of the minority agreed that a request be made to make this measure a special order?

Mr. HEPBURN. I can not say that there has been any agreement on the part of the committee, but I am of the opinion that no gentleman will object to the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I am a member of this committee, and if there is any objection to that order being made I have not heard it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] submitted the views of the minority, and I hope the gentleman will permit the matter to stand over until I can confer with him.

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman will understand that if I permit it to stand over I may not be fortunate in getting the Speaker's eye, as the gentleman knows. [Laughter.] Therefore I do not like to do it. Without the gentleman really has an objection, I say to him that, in my opinion, the gentleman for whom he speaks will, if present, vote for the adoption of this resolution. I believe that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There are two members of the minority present, who say there is no objection, and I shall not interpose any, and if there is anyone who does object to it he can do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the order just read.

The question was taken, and the order was agreed to.

NELLIE ETT HEEN.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 12240.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12240) granting to Nellie Ett Heen the south half of the northwest quarter and lot 4 of section 2, and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north, of range 101 west, in the State of North Dakota.

Whereas one Lem A. Heen did, on the 28th day of May, A. D. 1895, make homestead entry for the following described tract, to wit: South half of northwest quarter and lot 4 of section 2, and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north, of range 101 west, in the Minot land district, in the State of North Dakota, which application to enter was accepted and the entry placed of record, filing fee accepted, and receipt duly issued therefor to the said entryman, Lem A. Heen, by the officials of the said United States land office at Minot, in the said State of North Dakota; and

Whereas under and by virtue of the same the said entryman, Lem A. Heen, did thereafter enter upon said tract and has resided thereon continuously since said date, and is now residing thereon with his family, and has complied fully with the law relative to residence upon, cultivation, and improvement of Government homesteads, and has valuable and substantial improvements thereon; and

Whereas the said entryman did, on the 14th day of July, 1900, offer final proof for the tract above described, which proof was rejected on the 26th day of September, A. D. 1901, for the reason that the said entryman was not a citizen of the United States, neither could he become one, being born in China, and a Chinaman, and was not a qualified entryman and patent could not issue to him; and

Whereas the said entryman did emigrate to the United States on or about the year 1876, prior to the date of taking effect of the Chinese-exclusion act, and did thereafter marry one Nellie Ett Parker, a white woman and a citizen of the United States, and that there is issue of said marriage now living, and that under the ruling of the said United States land office patent can not issue to the said entryman, nor to the wife of the said entryman, nor to the child of the said entryman for the reasons stated aforesaid; and

Whereas in this a great hardship will be worked upon the said entryman and his said family and will deprive them of a home and of the fruits of their labor, for which under the law there is no remedy: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described land is hereby granted to Nellie Ett Heen, to wit: The south half of the northwest quarter and lot 4 of section 2, and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north, of range 101 west, situate in the Minot United States land district, in the State of North Dakota.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I would be glad if the gentleman will tell us how much there is of this land.

Mr. MARSHALL. One hundred and sixty acres.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will you state why it is necessary to pass this bill, and what committee of the House reported it?

Mr. MARSHALL. It was unanimously reported by the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has it the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office?

Mr. MARSHALL. Yes, sir.

Briefly, this bill provides for deeding 160 acres of land to a white woman, the wife of a Chinaman. The Chinaman was bona fide allowed to file on a homestead at Minot, N. Dak.; he paid his filing fee and the receipt was duly issued. The papers were passed by the General Land Office in Washington through error, for the reason that no Chinaman has the right, not being a citizen of the United States, and not being able to become a citizen of the United States, to file a homestead entry. This man has lived there with his wife and family since 1895 and made valuable improvements on this land. He has tendered final proof, which was rejected for the reason that he was not a citizen and could not become such. Under these circumstances it is deemed nothing more than right to deed the land to his wife for her benefit and that of her children.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MARSHALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

JOHN F. BRANSFORD.

Mr. LAMB. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 4083.

A bill (S. 4083) for the relief of Surg. John F. Bransford, United States Navy.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to transfer Surg. John F. Bransford, of the retired list of the United States Navy, from the half-pay list to the 75 per cent pay list of retired officers, under section 1588 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the original appointment and retirement of the said John F. Bransford under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 5, 1901, having been authorized because of disability incurred while in discharge of duty as passed assistant surgeon during the Spanish war. The said transfer shall take place as of the date of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I should like the gentleman to give us an explanation of the bill.

Mr. LAMB. This bill, Mr. Speaker, simply advances a gentleman now on the retired list from the 50 per cent grade to the 75 per cent grade. The bill has the unanimous report of the House committee and the Senate committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LAMB, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 1 o'clock and 33 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an additional estimate of appropriation for site for a new building for police court in the District of Columbia and preparation of plans therefor—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for the construction of Army General Hospital, District of Columbia—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation, under "Armament of fortifications," for cast steel top carriages for 12-inch mortars—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. J. W. DUFFEY, D. D., of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. CULLOM, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

LEASING OF UNOCCUPIED GOVERNMENT PROPERTY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report relative to the leasing for a period not exceeding five years of certain unoccupied and unproductive property of the United States under his control, for the leasing of which there is no authority under existing law, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC FOREST RESERVATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a draft of a proposed bill providing for the sale of timber and other material growing or being on public forest reservations, and for the renting or leasing of lands therein; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES S. LOBDELL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Charles S. Lobdell v. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIMS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Conrad, John Osborn, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel schooner Hope, Ephraim Hutchins, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 4083) for the relief of Surg. John F. Bransford, United States Navy.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 12240) granting to Nellie E. H. Heen the south half of the northwest quarter and lot 4 of section 2 and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north, of range 101 west, in the State of North Dakota; and

A bill (H. R. 15155) to refund the duties paid on merchandise brought into the United States from Porto Rico between April 11, 1899, and May 1, 1900, and also on merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 15794) to amend section 20 of an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I present a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, N. Y., represented by Mr. Morris K. Jessup, president, praying for the ratification of a reciprocal treaty with the Government of France. The petition is very short, and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the petition was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

[Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, founded A. D. 1768.]

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

May it please your honorable body, the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York respectfully represents:

That the extension of our export trade with foreign countries is now a pressing question, as enlarged markets for the products of our manufacturers, of our agricultural and other industries, have become most necessary for our commercial well-being;

That to secure such enlarged markets for our products, and to obtain the advantages that we seek for our own trade, we must depart from our policy of exclusiveness, and must offer certain reciprocal concessions in our duties on imports to those nations whose trade we desire to cultivate.

That among the treaties negotiated by our Government in the furtherance of this enlightened commercial policy the reciprocity convention with the Republic of France offers concessions of the greatest value to the export trade of the United States, and will open to our trade and manufactures a large and remunerative field.

That under the terms of this treaty the reductions from the French maximum to the minimum tariff average about 48 per cent, including oils, and about 26 per cent excluding them, and apply to the whole French tariff list, excluding 19 articles, whereas the reductions conceded on the part of the United States average only 6⅞ per cent, and apply to only 126 numbers out of 463 dutiable items, showing the greater advantage to be on our side.

That the important concessions to our great export trade obtained by our Government through the negotiation of this convention far outweigh the apprehension of possible slight injury to any isolated special interest.

Your memorialists respectfully urge upon your honorable body the early and favorable consideration of this most important subject; and your memorialists will ever pray.

GEO. WILSON, Secretary.

NEW YORK, December 8, 1902.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of the congregation of the Parks Chapel Methodist Episcopal Church, of Urbana, Ill., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in all immigrant stations; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Live Stock Exchange of the National Stock Yards of Illinois, praying for the enactment of legislation amending section 4386, Revised Statutes, regulating the shipping of cattle; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington presented a petition of sundry business firms of Seattle, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation making tea in bond free after January 1, 1903; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce and Board of Trade of Tacoma, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation for the district of Alaska, to open the land to settlement and the mineral wealth of that district to the industry of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. NELSON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Worthington and Brewster, in the State of Minnesota, praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas presented a memorial of the Five Civilized Tribes convention of Eufaula, Ind. T., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation contemplating the annexation of the Indian Territory, or any part thereof, to the Territory of Oklahoma or to any State; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. QUAY. I present resolutions of the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory, adopted at a convention held at Eufaula, in the Indian Territory, remonstrating against the passage of the bill to attach the Indian Territory to Oklahoma. This organization is in the nature of a Territorial government, and I ask that the resolutions be read.

There being no objection, the resolutions were read, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

McALESTER, IND. T., December 8, 1902.

Hon. MATTHEW S. QUAY,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.

SIR: By direction of the Hon. P. Porter, chairman of the Five Civilized Tribes convention, held at Eufaula, Ind. T., November 28 last, I hand you herewith a certified copy of the resolutions adopted at the said convention, and would respectfully request that you present the same to the Senate, so that the wishes of the Indians in the Indian Territory with reference to statehood may be known.

Very respectfully,

HENRY ANSLEY,
Secretary Five Civilized Tribes Convention.

Whereas the Five Civilized Tribes of the Indian Territory have by agreements made and entered into with the United States provided for the dissolution of their tribal governments; and

Whereas the changed conditions brought about by such agreements require a complete revolution in our land tenure and new laws and usages unknown to the Indians composing the Five Tribes of the Indian Territory, which conditions will require time for the new citizen to adapt himself to the changed order of things; and

Whereas these changes were apparent to the contracting parties at the time of the making of the said agreements, which is evidenced by the fact that a separate political organization was provided for the Indian Territory and the period for dissolution as said tribal governments was fixed at March 4, 1906; and

Whereas citizens of the United States, and not Indians, now resident in and upon the lands of the Five Tribes, are making, by petition and lobby influence, efforts to induce the Congress of the United States to ignore the spirit and letter of agreements by placing the Indian Territory under the laws of Oklahoma Territory; failing in that, to organize a regular United States Territory out of the present judicial organization known as the Indian Territory, either of which propositions would delay the work of the Government as now organized and satisfactorily proceeding under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior in our Territory for the fulfillment of the agreements referred to: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, By the duly authorized representatives of the Five Civilized Tribes in convention assembled at Eufaula, Ind. T., November 28, 1902:

That we affirm our confidence in the purpose of the United States Government to faithfully discharge the obligation she has assumed in her treaties with the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory.

We are opposed to and protest against any legislation by Congress that contemplates the annexation of the Indian Territory, or any part thereof, to the Territory of Oklahoma or to any State, and we insist upon our tribal government continuing intact and our tribal conditions remaining unchanged until March 4, 1906, at which time, should Congress deem it wise to change the present form of government in Indian Territory, we ask that a State be formed out of the territory composing the Indian Territory, without the preliminary steps of a Territorial form of government.

The authority and supervision of the Department of the Interior over Indian affairs in the Indian Territory and the duties imposed on the Dawes Commission by such authority in the distribution of the land belonging to the Five Civilized Tribes are sufficient for the present demand of government and satisfactory to the owner of the soil.

It is incumbent on us as self-governing people to propose a State form of government and take part in the establishment of the same for the country owned by us, to take effect at the dissolution of tribal government in 1906.

We most earnestly protest against the misrepresentations found in the petitions presented by the people assembling in conventions at different places in the Indian Territory purporting to represent the wishes of the Indian Territory, firmly believing as we do that they represent no part of the Indian population and a very small part of the white population of the Indian Territory in so far as they represent the people of the Indian Territory as asking for Territorial form of government or statehood jointly with Oklahoma.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true and correct copy of the resolutions adopted by the Five Civilized Tribes' convention, held at Eufaula, in Creek Nation, Ind. T., November 23, 1902.

HENRY ANSLEY,
Secretary of said Convention.

Mr. QUAY presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 6512) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States courts, and for other purposes; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FORAKER. I present sundry letters, telegrams, and petitions from various individuals and firms in the State of Ohio, favoring the enactment of legislation to reduce the tax on distilled spirits, and also to extend the outage allowance so as to include all liquors in bond. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance, and that the names of the several senders of the telegrams and letters be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is contrary to the usual practice.

Mr. FORAKER. I mean the persons from whom they come. I think that has been done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator request that the telegrams be printed?

Mr. FORAKER. No; the names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a general rule that where petitions are printed in the RECORD the names of the petitioners shall not be printed. The rule, however, would not apply to simply one signature.

Mr. FORAKER. I know that is the general rule, and therefore I made the request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio?

There being no objection, the petitions were referred to the Committee on Finance and the names ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Hauser Brenner & Fath Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Henry Tecklenburg, of Loramie, Ohio; T. W. Voss & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; I. Levi & Co., of Portsmouth, Ohio; The Marietta Distillery Company, of Marietta, Ohio; W. W. Lesher, of Pomeroy, Ohio; The Henderson Lithographing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Ferdinand Westheimer & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Beech Hill Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; V. E. Shields & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Standard Distilling and Distributing Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Duroy & Haine Company, of Sandusky, Ohio; Mihalovitch, Fletcher & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Ferdinand Westheimer & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Edgewood Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; H. Rosenthal, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Mayer Brothers, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The G. & B. Gerdes Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Fleischmann & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Klein Brothers, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Joseph Silverman & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Mihavritch Flocher & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Star Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Walter Frieberg, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Diamond Distillery Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Sunny Side Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; J. & A. Freibery, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Hoffheimer Brothers Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Levi & Ottenheimer, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Old 76 Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Mountain Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Freiberg & Workum, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Ullman Einstein & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; The Clifton Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; C. Hossfield & Son, of Hamilton, Ohio; Fleischmann & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Rheinstrom, Bellman, Johnson & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; E. Bloch & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; Isaac Winkler & Bro., of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Union Distilling Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The James Walsh Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; Franc Heyn & Co., of Toledo, Ohio; Joseph A. Magnus & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; H. W. Avier & Bro., of Cincinnati, Ohio; L. Kahn & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; Fred Rauh & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; S. Kuhn & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio; A. C. Kaplan, of Cincinnati, Ohio; H. Rosenthal & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Turner Looker Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; William Edwards & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio; The McCart Christy Company, of Cleveland, Ohio; William C. Biles & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Guggenheim Brothers, of Cleveland, Ohio; Kaufmann, Baer & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; Strauss, Pritz & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Weidman Company, of Cleveland, Ohio; A. E. Clarkson & Sons, of Cincinnati, Ohio; J. Frager & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio; The Kayser & Hegner Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio; J. Debard & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, and J. Michelson & Bros., of Cincinnati, Ohio.

Mr. HOAR presented a petition of sundry ex-Union soldiers of Massachusetts, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the pensions of soldiers and sailors who lost limbs in the service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Selectmen of Winthrop, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the salaries of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the Second Corps Cadets of Salem, Mass., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Dick bill, to promote the efficiency of the militia, and praying for the adoption of certain amendments thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. DEPEW presented a petition of the Presbyterian Ministers' Association of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL presented the petition of Adolph Lippman, of Maryville, Mo., praying for the passage of House bills 178 and 179, relative to a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 6351) granting a pension to Ira K. Eaton; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Presbytery of Dubuque, Iowa, praying for the establishment of a laboratory for the study of criminals, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Manning and Mahaska County, in the State of Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for a reduction of the tax on distilled liquors; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CULLOM, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11576) granting permission to Capt. B. H. McCalla and others to accept presents and decorations tendered to them by the Emperor of Germany and others, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15445) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at Sand Bar Ferry, below the city of Augusta, Ga., reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 134) to provide for the refitting of the revenue cutter Fessenden, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. BERRY subsequently said: I reported a few moments ago Senate joint resolution 134, and it was indefinitely postponed. At the request of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] I should like to have the order indefinitely postponing the joint resolution reconsidered and the joint resolution placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report. The Senator from Michigan desires to look into the matter, and I told him that I would make a motion to reconsider the order indefinitely postponing the joint resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. I hope that will be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the vote by which the adverse report on Senate joint resolution 134 was agreed to and the joint resolution indefinitely postponed will be reconsidered, and on the request of the Senator from Arkansas the joint resolution will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6231) authorizing Robert A. Chapman, of Alabama, his associates and assigns, to use the waters of the Coosa River, in Alabama, for the purpose of generating electricity, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTUS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5891) to authorize the President to appoint Brig. Gen. H. C. Merriam to the grade of major-general in the United States Army on the retired list, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10095) for the relief of Levi L. Reed, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14801) to make Wilmington, N. C., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FOSTER of Louisiana, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4471) for the relief of James M. Chisham, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6228) to establish Portal, N. Dak., a subport of entry and extend thereto the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

OFFICE RENT AT CONSULATES.

Mr. CULLOM. I am directed by the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6447) to amend section 1706, Revised Statutes, relating to consuls, to report it favorably without amendment, and as it is a very short measure, and I think there will be no objection to it, I ask that it be considered now.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to amend section 1706 of the Revised Statutes so as to read:

SEC. 1706. The President may allow consuls-general, consuls, and commercial agents who are not allowed to trade actual expenses of office rent, not to exceed in any case $1,800 per annum, whenever he shall think there is sufficient reason therefor.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REFUND OF TONNAGE TAXES.

Mr. NELSON. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6439) for the refund of certain tonnage taxes, to report it back favorably without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to refund additional tonnage taxes, at the rate of $1 per ton, amounting to $7,352, heretofore levied on the steamers Santiago de Cuba, Santiago, Cienfuegos, and Olinda on entry at New York from Cuban ports.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT TO DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $3,000 for preparing and reprinting a new edition of the Consular Regulations, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

EUGENE F. HARDING.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That Eugene F. Harding have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report; the same being in connection with Senate bill No. 3163, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, now pending before the Committee on Pensions of the Senate.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12240) granting to Nellie Ett Heen the south half of the northwest quarter, and lot 4 of section 2 and lot 1 of section 3, in township 154 north of range 101 west, in the State of North Dakota, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 15155) to refund the amount of duties paid on merchandise brought into the United States from Porto Rico between April 11, 1899, and May 1, 1900, and also on merchandise brought into the United States from the Philippine Islands between April 11, 1899, and March 8, 1902, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico.

ANTHRACITE COAL STRIKE COMMISSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15372, the bill making appropriations for the Anthracite Coal Arbitration Commission.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments of the committee will be stated in their order.

Mr. ALLISON. Before taking a vote upon the amendment—although there appear to be several, it is, in fact, but one amendment—I wish to modify a portion of the amendment, beginning in line 9, page 2, after the word "Provided," by omitting the words printed in italics and inserting what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment as modified will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the bill, line 9, after the word "Provided," strike out the amendment proposed by the committee in the following words:

That the members of said commission shall be allowed the sum of $15 per day each while employed in such service in lieu of traveling and all other expenses.

And insert:

That the members of said commission shall be allowed the sum of $15 per day each, the assistant recorders $10 per day each, and the other employees of the commission in the service of the Government $6 per day each, while employed in the work of the commission, in lieu of traveling and all other expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa withdraws the committee amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I withdraw the amendment printed in italics and wish to substitute what has been read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In lieu of the amendment of the committee the amendment which has just been read is substituted.

Mr. BERRY. I offered an amendment and had it printed, and it is on the desk, I presume. It is an amendment to the amendment as originally reported by the committee. I do not know whether it is so worded now that it would come at the proper place, since the Senator from Iowa has changed the committee amendment. It was offered to the amendment as reported by the committee. I should like to have it read and to get a vote upon it.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that by unanimous consent the words I sent to the desk be substituted for the words printed in italics. Then the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas will apply to the amendment as now proposed.

Mr. BERRY. I simply said that as I sent the amendment up before the Senator made the change, I did not know whether it was properly worded as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. Let it be read and then we can tell.

Mr. BERRY. I ask that the amendment to the amendment may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the amendment which has just been offered may take the place of the amendment originally reported by the committee. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made. Now, the Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment to that amendment. All it will need, perhaps, will be a change of place, or something of that kind.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the amendment to the amendment read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. In line 4, page 2, after the word "President," insert the words "not to exceed $4,000 per annum."

Page 2, line 10, after the word "allowed," strike out the words "the sum of $15 per day" and insert the words "their actual expenses."

Lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "in lieu of traveling and all other expenses" and insert the words "not to exceed $10 per day."

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to my amendment to the amendment.

This bill as it came from the House of Representatives appropriated $50,000 for the payment of the salaries and expenses of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission. It left it entirely in the discretion of the President as to how much should be paid to the commissioners, how much should be paid to the different clerks, and the amount of expenses which should be allowed. He was only limited by the sum of $50,000. The bill also expressly repealed the law now in existence which prohibits an officer of the Government from receiving two salaries at the same time. As it came from the House the President could pay those now in the service of the United States and on this commission, or doing work under the commission, such salary as in his discretion he deemed best.

I do not know whether it is now the case, as the amendment has been changed; but as it was reported by the committee that part of those connected with the commission who are now in the Government service were prohibited, as I understand it, from receiving any salary; in other words, the committee struck out that portion of the bill as passed by the House which repealed the present statute on the subject. I should like to ask the Senator from Iowa whether as he changed it this morning that part is changed?

Mr. ALLISON. There was no change made this morning except simply the change I suggested to the Senator from Arkansas a day or two ago. The change simply provides for the payment of a per diem to the assistant recorders and the employees in lieu of a general accounting for expenses.

Mr. HALE. But the feature which prohibits additional pay to men who are now drawing salaries is still retained.

Mr. BERRY. It is still retained in the bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BERRY. That is all right.

Now, Mr. President, the question raised by my amendment is whether the Congress of the United States shall determine how much salary shall be paid to these commissioners, or whether that shall be left to the President of the United States.

I want to say that I am opposed to Congress giving what sometimes—improperly, I suppose—is called a "slush fund" to the Executive to pay out alone in his discretion. I think it will not be contended by anyone that there is any authority in the Constitution or the law which authorized the President to appoint this Coal Strike Commission, nor did he claim that he had any such authority. He simply claimed that a great emergency had arisen, which he believed justified him in taking the action he did.

But the question as to whether the members of the commission shall be paid at all or not rests with Congress. There is no legal obligation upon the Congress of the United States to appropriate one dollar. However, if Congress determines to pay the commissioners, then I say Congress should say how much shall be paid them. It should not be left to the President of the United States to give one of them $10,000 or $20,000 if he sees proper, but the responsibility should be taken by Congress and the salary should be fixed at a specified sum, or at least there ought to be a maximum fixed beyond which the President could not go in paying the commissioners.

I do not believe it is a proper precedent to permit the Chief Executive to fix salaries. I will not refer to past transactions. There has been legislation of this kind heretofore. There have been commissions appointed where it was left alone to the President to determine how much they should be paid, and no report has ever been made upon the amount that was so paid.

Therefore I believe it to be the duty of the Senate to amend the bill and fix some sum by way of salaries for the commissioners, who are not now in the service of the Government of the United States. In the amendment which I have offered I have fixed it at $4,000 a year. It seems to me that that is reasonable pay to the commissioners. However, if the Senate should think that amount too small, let them strike out the $4,000 and insert some larger sum. But what I insist upon is that Congress shall determine the salary, and it should not be left solely to the discretion of any executive officer to say how much salary shall be paid. That is the first proposition.

Now, the committee in its amendment provides that the President shall be authorized to pay each of the commissioners, including those who now hold office under the Government of the United States, the sum of $15 a day in lieu of traveling and all other expenses.

I submit, Mr. President, that that is an unreasonable sum. Fifteen dollars a day for their expenses amounts to more than the salary of a member of the lower House of Congress or a member of the United States Senate during the year. Bear in mind that the committee propose to give that in addition to such salary as the President may in his discretion think they are entitled to receive. I believe that it is an improper sum. I do not believe that their expenses will amount to one-half of $15 a day. If you intend to give them a salary and cover it up under the name of expenses, I submit that that is not the proper way to legislate by the Congress of the United States. We all know that it will not cost the commissioners $15 a day in the way of expenses while at this work. You can board, I think I heard a distinguished member of the Senate say yesterday, at the Waldorf-Astoria probably for $15 a day. It is an unreasonable sum for expenses. It sets a precedent which ought not to be set by the Congress of the United States.

I do not wish to cramp this commission. I do not wish to interfere with them in any way in the discharge of their duties. But I do say that when instead of allowing them specifically for their expenses the amount of $5 a day, or $2 a day, or $3, or whatever it may be, to give them arbitrarily $15 a day and then leave it to the President to give them so much more as he deems proper, is legislating in a way that was never intended by the people of this country or by those who framed the Constitution.

I therefore shall ask for a vote on my amendment, which, as I said, limits the salary to not exceeding $4,000 a year and provides for the payment of their actual expenses, provided they shall not exceed $10 a day. It is unfair and unjust to cover up by a specific sum, under the head of expenses, the amount they receive. They ought to file vouchers and show what their real expenses are. That they ought to be paid; and then they ought to be paid a reasonable salary, which I believe should be fixed, not by the executive department, but by the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas is to the committee's proposed amendment, commencing at line 4 on page 2.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the amendment be divided, so that we can vote on each proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will divide the amendment. The question is on agreeing to the first amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. Page 2, line 4, after the word "President," insert the words "not exceeding $4,000 per annum."

Mr. HOAR. Have the words in italics in the second and third lines been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; those words have not been acted upon. None of the committee amendments have been acted on.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I understand the effect of the amendment to be——

Mr. DANIEL. I ask that the amendment to the amendment may be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. Page 2, line 4, after the word "President," insert the words "not exceeding $4,000 per annum;" so that if amended it will read:

And for such compensation of the members of said commission, its employees, and the assistant recorders, who are not officers or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government, as may be fixed by the President, not exceeding $4,000 per annum.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to suggest to my honorable friend from Arkansas a consideration about the phraseology of his amendment. It implies that Congress contemplates a long and permanent service. It speaks of the compensation as a salary per annum.

I suppose it is true in our past experiences that where these special boards have been established they very often prolong their service a great while at an annual and not a per diem compensation. They have not their report quite ready, and they will get it in at the beginning of the next Congress, and then afterwards there is constant delay. I do not think that would apply at all to gentlemen of such high character as those who are on this board, but I do not think it is a good precedent to put into a temporary board the suggestion that a salary of so much per annum shall be paid, as if the board was expected to last at least a year. I think it would be better to have a per diem rather than an annual compensation fixed. The fixing of a per diem only shows that Congress is thinking of a day, and not of a year, as the measure of their time; but also in that case they are not paid except for the day when they are actually at work, while an annual salary runs when they may be doing something else. I do not want to meddle with the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas, but I make that suggestion.

Mr. BERRY. I will modify the amendment so as to make it a per diem rate corresponding to $4,000 per year.

Mr. BAILEY. Say $12 a day.

Mr. BERRY. I will say "$12 per day for the time they are actually employed." I will modify the amendment in that way to meet the suggestion which has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] modifies his amendment so as to make it read "not exceeding $12 per day for the time employed."

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I do not regard this question of compensation as of any very great importance one way or the other. This is an extraordinary commission, appointed under extraordinary circumstances, and is composed of gentlemen who have other pressing occupations, whether they are in the service of the United States or out of it. Some of the members of the commission have consented—one of them has, I know—reluctantly to enter upon this service, because, of course, it is impossible to know the tenure of the appointment and the length of the service. I do not think that a commission of this character should be tied down to a per diem compensation.

If it is not the wish of the Senate to leave this question to the discretion of the President, which the committee, I believe, thought it a safe discretion to lodge in him as respects these commissioners, then, I think, instead of allowing the commissioners a per diem compensation we should give them a fixed sum for the service they are performing. Nobody can tell, I agree, whether it will be a service of two months or three months or six months, but if Congress is to fix the compensation of those gentlemen who are not now in official station we should allow them, I think, a lump sum. For one, I should be willing to allow them $4,000 apiece for this service; or if the Senate should think that too much, let it be made $2,500.

I think the President, if the discretion were left with him, would allow them a reasonable sum for the service. We all know that it is an extraordinary service, an exceptional one, and I think we should not for a moment stop short of giving the commissioners not only a reasonable compensation, but a full compensation, for the services they are rendering the country.

Mr. DANIEL. May I interrupt the Senator by a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. Does the Senator propose that the per diem salary which he suggests should apply to those who are already in the service of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not. It will only apply to the three commissioners who are not now holding office under the authority of the United States. The bill, as sent to us from the House of Representatives, fails to provide compensation for those members of the commission now in public employment.

Mr. TELLER. I am a member of the Committee on Appropriations, but I was not present when this bill was considered. I want to know whether the committee considered the propriety of making an allowance, for instance, to the chairman of the commission, who is a judge of a United States court and who is absent from his judicial district, for his expenses while he is so absent?

Mr. ALLISON. We propose to allow the expenses of all the commissioners.

Mr. TELLER. All of them are to receive an allowance for expenses?

Mr. ALLISON. All of them.

Mr. TELLER. But compensation is to be paid only to those who are not Government officials. It seems to me that the bill ought to be a little more definite in that particular.

Mr. ALLISON. I think if the Senator will examine the bill carefully he will see——

Mr. TELLER. I have only had a moment in which to examine it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that the compensation is to be fixed by the President.

Mr. TELLER. I do not think that is a very wise thing to do.

Mr. ALLISON. All the members of the commission not holding official station will receive compensation for their services. Of course, those who hold official positions will receive no compensation, because the committee have proposed to strike out the provision of the bill to allow compensation to them.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that it is a proper thing for Congress to fix the compensation and not for the President to do so. I suggest to the chairman of the committee that it would be much better, if $4,000 is the right sum—I do not say whether it is or not; I do not know—we should fix that or some definite sum. It is not, however, a matter of very much consequence to us whether we give these people $4,000 or $5,000; but whatever we give them they are rendering service that we hope will be of great value, but it is only a temporary service, and we do not want to give the commissioners such a salary as would induce them to continue indefinitely this investigation. We want it to terminate some day, and the sooner it terminates the better for all concerned.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Committee on Appropriations, as a matter of fact, tried to take a conservative course upon this really very important bill. It is important because it is a clear innovation. It should be guarded so that it shall not be too much a precedent. The House of Representatives sent us the bill with all the bars taken down. They sent us a bill that left the entire question of compensation—not only of the members of the commission who hold office, but the outside members—entirely at the control of the President, and in terms placed a fund in his hands, to be treated in that way, without any intervention on the part of Congress. We did not think that a good thing to do, and I do not think that it is a good thing to do. In the first place, it committed to the President the tremendous power of taking men already holding distinct civil offices requiring their time and attention, who are paid a definite sum, and adding at his pleasure any amount to that salary already fixed.

The practice, Mr. President, of selecting officers of the Government for special duty, to be designated by the President, outside of their regular duties, is a pernicious practice. In itself it is bad. The Senate has had this question before it at a past day and expressed itself very clearly that this should not be generally allowed. It becomes all the more a departure from the spirit of our laws and an objectionable thing when to that is added the power of the President to fix any compensation that he chooses in addition to what the officers already draw. I should not like to see any precedent established under which the President should constitute a commission, even under the law—under a framed and passed and existing law—and should be authorized to select members of the judiciary, of the executive department, of the Senate, or of the House of Representatives, and make them a commission constituted by him with the indefinite power of giving them whatever salary he pleased.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations have proceeded to cut that up by the roots, and without thinking it desirable now to protest against the selection of these gentlemen who do hold office, who are competent and worthy men, who are engaged earnestly in their work, we did think it desirable to put a restriction by striking out the provision that the House had put in, especially repealing the sections of the Revised Statutes that prohibited two salaries, and leaving those sections in standing force. That is the answer to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. We thought we did it in the most efficacious way by striking out the provision of the House that lets open the door.

That carried us another step. It was a monition to the President not to give extravagant salaries to the men selected by him outside of the officers of the Government—three or four of them—when we said that a circuit judge of the United States, who receives $6,000; a retired brigadier-general, who, with allowances, receives about $5,500; the Commissioner of Labor, who has a regular salary, and the assistant recorder, who is an officer of the Government. Mr. Moseley, should only receive the pay fixed by law for the offices which they now hold. It was notice to the President, which I have no doubt he will take, that the other members should not be given extravagant salaries, which would be wrong to the other members of the commission, who are confined to their present official salaries.

Therefore we had no question that the President, in fixing these other salaries, would fix them at four or five thousand dollars, certainly at not more than $6,000, which the highest officer gets; and that is an answer to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who wants to fix the salary in terms. In effect, in spirit, we have fixed it, and I look upon it as a matter of congratulation that Congress has the opportunity, and that the Senate has seized that opportunity, of not letting this go as a general sluiceway with the whole power given to the President. I do not fear that the President would unduly exercise it. He is a man who is responsive to suggestions that are made, either here or elsewhere, by sensible persons; but it is not well to leave the matter as the House has sent it to us.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question in reference to the point he is just now considering?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If I understand the Senator correctly, he said the action of the committee in providing that those members of the commission who are in office should not receive any additional salary was an intimation as to the amount the President should fix in paying the others. Now, I should like the Senator to tell me if it would be an intimation to the President to pay the remainder of the commissioners $6,000 a year, which is the salary received by Judge Gray, or $5,500, which is the salary received by General Wilson, or the $5,000 received by Commissioner Wright, or the $2,500 or $4,000 which is received by Mr. Moseley—which one of these salaries would the President feel called upon to take as the rule by which he shall pay the remainder of the members of the commission?

Mr. HALE. I think if the Senator or I were President—which we probably never shall be—we would take a fair average and make the compensation about $5,000. That would be the natural and customary way of fixing it, and I have no doubt that is what the President will do—that he will fix it at just about $5,000.

The suggestion has come out here in debate, and there is something in the suggestion that has been made that we do not want this an annual salary to go on from year to year. We do not intend that. I would not object to putting it in terms that the outside commissioners shall have $5,000 for their entire services, whatever time they take. I should say they would probably not take a year.

I should say also, with regard to expenses, that this should not be left entirely to one-man power. We ought not to be subjected to the reproach that we mean to be niggardly. I do not think $15 a day would be too much for all the expenses of these commissioners. They are not constantly engaged in this work. They hold sessions; then they go to their homes, and then they go back; and the allowance for expenses includes not only their hotel bills, but their traveling expenses. Senators know how soon $10 a day is eaten up. I do not think that the scale of $15 a day to these commissioners—they have to live at the best hotels in the places where they sit—will enable them to save a dollar. The proposition is not open, in my mind, to the objection suggested by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] that it is piecing out their salaries. They will get nothing out of it.

I do not know but that the suggestion came from the Senator in charge of the bill himself that it will satisfy everybody to make this compensation $5,000 in all, letting no question arise about how long the commission shall continue, and then fix a per diem for expenses, as we have put it, and pass the bill.

I am glad the opportunity has been given here in the Senate for some expression to the effect that this unlimited and uncontrolled power shall not as a precedent be left to any one man.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have been very much interested in what the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has said, and I am very much gratified both by what has fallen from him and from the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. What they have said is a full recognition of the principle embodied in the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY]. So far as the details of the bill are concerned, I think they are of comparatively little importance.

The important thing is to maintain that which is emphasized by the remark of the Senator from Maine that in the appropriation of money Congress shall everywhere definitely prescribe what shall be expended for given purposes.

Mr. President, we have had at one time, it will be remembered, action by this Senate and by Congress which might be deemed to be in conflict with this principle, but that was under very exceptional circumstances. I refer to the time when Congsess put $50,000,000 at the discretion of the President, to be expended for the public defense and safety in a time of very great emergency, just prior to the declaration of war against Spain. But that can not be said to be a precedent for anything less grave than the situation which was then presented. It was a matter which was recognized by all as of paramount necessity, and Senators who were then here will remember the fact that the action of the Senate, and I think also of the House of Representatives, though I was not present in the House when the bill was passed and can not say with certainty, but the action of the Senate was absolutely unanimous. Not only so, but it required no argument or suggestion from anybody to satisfy every Senator that that was the proper action at that time; and it is a historic fact that when that bill for the appropriation of $50,000,000 for the public defense, placed without limitation at the disposal of the President, was submitted to the Senate there was not a word said by any Senator either pro or con, and it passed by the absolutely unanimous vote of the Senate. No Senator upon that occasion then said anything on the floor of the Senate in advocacy of the appropriation, because nothing was necessary to be said. We were all of one mind in support of the appropriation.

It is probably proper that I should allude to another enactment which has been more recently made by Congress, in which there may seem to have been a departure from this general principle. That was in the bill providing for the construction of the isthmian canal. It is true that in that bill as it became a law there is a provision—a provision contained in the amendment drawn and offered by myself—which authorizes the President of the United States to fix the salary of the commissioners; but that even is limited by the qualification "until otherwise directed by Congress." The circumstances there were peculiar. We had to go to a tropical country; it was impossible to say what would be the conditions presented at the time, when possibly it would not be practicable to wait for the action of Congress—conditions which might lay upon the President the duty of determining the matter of salary in such a way as would enable him to get the benefit of the labor of persons whose skill and experience would make them proper persons for that great work.

I quite agree with the suggestion which the Senator from Iowa makes, or that of the Senator from Maine. I care not whether it is a limitation of amount, whether it is a per diem, or anything, so it is specified by Congress. I do not want in any way to express any want of confidence in the President. I simply desire to say that that which is intended as the peculiar and exclusive function of Congress, the appropriation of money, shall not in any way be frittered away by conferring the same upon the President, even though what is done under it may not amount to any very large amount in the expenditure of money.

I simply desire before taking my seat, however, to ask the Senator from Iowa, under the suggestion made by him as to the payment of salary, whether he still proposes to retain the provision in the bill which fixes the per diem expenditure at $15, or has he accepted the suggestion made by Senators for a reduced amount?

Mr. ALLISON. No; the committee believe, under all the circumstances that surround this commission, that $15 a day is a fair compensation for all the expenses they incur, including traveling expenses. It is a liberal allowance, I agree.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has there ever been any officer of the Government allowed such a sum?

Mr. ALLISON. I think not.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a dangerous precedent, then.

Mr. ALLISON. But there is no officer of the Government of whom I know who has ever been engaged in such a temporary service. For instance, we allow judges $10 a day, covering their expenses when away from home in the service of the court; but this is a temporary service and has to be performed under exceptional circumstances. Therefore I think, if the Senator will permit me, and I believe the majority of the committee think, that is a fair compensation. It is a liberal one, I agree, but we all expect that this work will be completed in from four to six months, certainly in six months. Therefore we can well afford to pay these gentlemen liberally not only for their services, but for their expenses.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will agree to such an amount as will command the entire unanimous vote of the Senate. We all desire that there shall be a liberal amount for this allowance, but the amount fixed by the committee seems to many of us to be excessive. I think it would be a proper illustration of the conservatism and liberality at the same time of the Senate, not only as to money, but as to sentiment, if in a matter of this kind there should be no division among us and we could all agree upon the bill to be passed.

This is a matter unique, without any parallel, arising, as it did, out of what was a great public emergency, and I might say a great public necessity. It would be very gratifying if the details of this measure should be so framed as to have no division among us as to what should be done. Speaking for myself, I desire to say that, while it was not warranted by law, I think the action of the President was one highly to be commended, and I believe that it was instrumental in the aversion of a very great disaster. Of course it was not within the scope of the power of the President to appoint the commissioners and clothe them with any powers or to make any contract with them, and I do not understand that he undertook so to do. The payment of this commission, as stated by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], is an entirely voluntary matter on the part of Congress, and while there is, as suggested by him, no legal obligation there is a very high moral obligation. So I should be extremely glad if the Senator from Iowa would so modify the amount proposed by him for expenses, as other matters of detail have been almost practically agreed upon, as to command the vote of the entire Chamber without division in the passage of this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was not present in the Appropriations Committee when this matter was considered, and therefore I am more or less ignorant as to the reasons which governed that committee in its action. I have been struck with the cogency of the argument and position taken by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], but there have presented themselves to my mind some other questions which are cognate, and I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, or some other member of the Senate who is willing, to give me information, or at least a guess, as to how many of these commissions we are going to have in the near future.

The coal strike was, of course, a very grave situation, precipitated by peculiar conditions, which, according to the newspapers, were caused by an absolute disregard and trampling under foot of the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania. The question as to the punishment or control of trusts or combinations of capitalists who seek to monopolize the necessaries of life is one with which we are all deeply concerned, and we have various prescriptions, or attempts at prescriptions, for the disease, which all regard as a dangerous one, without anyone being willing apparently to make anybody take any physic. The last doctor that prescribed, I believe, merely wanted light—"publicity."

If we are going to stop short as a legislative assembly, clothed with the power, or supposed to be clothed with the power, to protect our constituents, I want to know when the next acute condition is produced by reason of these monopolies, whether the President is going to authorize the appointment of another commission, or rather appoint one, and then come to us with, you might say, the precedent established, as well as the unavoidable faith on his part that we will give him money in order that he may continue indefinitely to salve, to pour oil, so to speak, on this disturbed condition, to temporize with this unknown quantity in our public matters which assumed so threatening an aspect in the recent past.

Are we going to handle these things by commission, or are we going to endeavor to have an arbitration court appointed by the President without any authority other than a voluntary one assumed by his agents or those whom he requests to act? That is the view I should like to have some Senator express himself upon, and let us determine, while we are going along and laying down a rule, just how much or how little this thing is going to cost and how often we are going to be called on to take up the question of the settlement of the expenses of commissions appointed by the Executive contrary to the Constitution, and outside of his duty and authority, to deal with matters which belong to us peculiarly and which we shirk.

That is the condition, so far as I can understand it. I may be alone in my opinion, but it appears that we are dealing here in a euphemistic or some kind of a soft-hearted way with a very serious disease. We are endeavoring to postpone the time when we shall have to stick in the surgeon's knife and cut out the ulcer. I confess I do not like poultices of this kind, and I should like to get some information from those who are in the class of rulers, those who control and direct the Government, those who are responsible for the situation and in whom the people have reposed responsibility and power, as to whether we are to go along during this session of Congress and do nothing more than this.

Will we merely turn on some "light," or pretend to open some window to give some light, or light a dark lantern to furnish light, or shall we repeat Diogenes's programme of going around to find an honest man or a brave man to take up and uproot this thing? Are capitalists who are monopolists and who seize upon the necessaries of life and rob the people being, you might say, encouraged to do so by our failure to do what is our plain duty?

Mr. LODGE. I wish merely to ask the Senator from Iowa a question. Does he understand that the recorder is included among the commissioners?

Mr. ALLISON. I do so understand.

Mr. LODGE. He does not have to be specifically named?

Mr. ALLISON. He does not. The Commissioner of Labor, Mr. Wright——

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. Was appointed recorder, and then afterwards made commissioner, as I understand; so that the bill covers it.

Mr. HALE. There is no doubt about it.

Mr. LODGE. I observed in the proviso that the recorder was not mentioned, and I merely wished to inquire.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, a word as respects the question of compensation and also respecting the amendment proposed by the Senate committee to the bill as it came to us from the House.

We regarded the precedent sought to be set here, of repealing those provisions of the Revised Statutes which forbid public officers from receiving compensation so as to allow them to receive double pay, as a mistake, and therefore we struck that out. Hence all those holding office must be content with their present compensation. I do not know, but I am of the opinion that the President of the United States would be very glad if we would relieve him of the duty of fixing the compensation of the remainder of the commissioners. I do not think he seeks that service or has any wish to fix the compensation.

I think that under the circumstances the President was justified in looking around and selecting the public officers whom he did select for this service. He does not pretend, as I understand, that this commission is authorized by law or that he had any authority under the statutes or under the Constitution, if you please, to appoint it. But he was confronted with what an eminent citizen once said was a condition and not a theory, and he undertook the solving of the problem of the anthracite coal strike when probably no other person could have done so. I believe the strike began as early as May.

Mr. KEAN. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. The whole summer passed away with an endeavor to reconcile the differences between the laborers and the corporations owning the mines.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. TILLMAN. Is the Senator informed, or is he prepared to answer the inquiry, whether the coal combinations, the operators, are mining coal according to law? Have they trampled the constitution of Pennsylvania under foot or not; and if they have, was it in the power of the Attorney-General under the antitrust act of Congress to give relief; and if not, is it not the duty of Congress to clothe somebody somewhere with authority to relieve the people from such oppressions and dangers and discomforts and actual suffering as now exist by reason of this unlawful and unconstitutional condition?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, that is a question which my mind fails to grasp at a single stroke. It involves so many questions, and so many questions which are not involved in the matter we now have before us, that I trust the Senator will excuse me from entering upon its discussion.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will allow me, I think in a general way that this body has jurisdiction to deal by and large with the great question of corporations, as respects what are called trusts, etc., but that subject has no relation whatever to this appropriation. And I will say——

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will allow me to answer him so far as I can. I will say to the Senator that I have no knowledge, except that which is gained by general reading, of the statutes of Pennsylvania and the constitution of Pennsylvania. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] undoubtedly is entirely familiar with that subject. Nor have I any other knowledge of the condition in the coal fields than that gained by reading the newspapers.

I only know, Mr. President, that the anthracite coal field is embraced within an area, it is said, of about 450 miles. I know that it furnishes fuel for more than 30,000,000 people. I know that it requires or has required in the past from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 tons to supply that want, and owing to the difficulties between those who own the coal and those who produce it from the mines becoming very serious, production ceased.

The President naturally took an interest in the subject. He tried in various ways to deal with it as a citizen. He asked the Commissioner of Labor to go into those fields and inquire into the situation. That fact I gather from the newspapers, and I believe it is published in the report. He tried so far as he could, as I suppose did every other citizen interested in the subject, to settle this question. Finally the President found, or believed at least, that if he would interpose he could secure in some way an adjustment of this difficulty.

He tried to bring the operators and the miners together, and they were brought together in a way. In the selection of this commission the President was largely, I am sure, governed by the conditions of the voluntary agreement made between the operators and the miners. In a general way they designated who should be appointed, and I have no doubt that accounts for the appointment of that eminent jurist, Mr. Justice Gray. I have no doubt we all agree that he, as chairman of the commission, will probe the facts to the bottom and will make a fair and just decision as respects the questions which have been submitted to the commission by the operators and the miners, and not the President, except in the way suggested by the miners and the operators.

Now, what is true of Judge Gray is also true of Commissioner Wright, who has made a life study of labor questions, and although he was a public officer, I think it was well enough that he should have been selected as one of the commission. So of Mr. Moseley, who is familiar with transportation matters. I have no doubt, Mr. President, that the President of the United States hesitated to make these selections from gentlemen occupying public stations, but he found, under the circumstances surrounding this special case, that they were the people who were satisfactory to the two sides to the question.

Now, the only point we have to consider is not what the future will bring forth, but whether or not this was a question of serious difficulty at the moment, and whether the President as an eminent citizen was justified in authorizing this tribunal, and then whether or not these eminent citizens did the right or the wrong thing in accepting this service. It is a remarkable service and it is an exceptional service, one that will occupy only a few weeks or a few months. I have no fear of any precedent being set by it.

Mr. MORGAN. May I ask the Senator from Iowa a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it not be a very much better plan to appropriate this sum of money, $50,000, or whatever sum is requisite, as a contingent fund to the President of the United States, to be used in the domestic service? We are appropriating every year, and we appropriated in the last appropriation bill, I understand, $250,000 for contingent purposes to the President, to be used in respect to our foreign relations. He does not have to account for it in any way, and Congress is not legislatively committed in any way at all to the application he may make of it.

So it seems to me in this case this honorable committee should prepare and present a substitute for the bill, providing that $50,000 be appropriated for the contingent fund to the President of the United States for domestic uses or uses within the United States. Of course he would understand what it means. The difficulty I encounter, if the Senator will pardon me a moment, is this: We are starting upon a legislative recognition of this manner of settling disputes. If we establish the precedent and put some pretty high price upon the salaries of commissioners we may expect that disputes will originate for the purpose of having such arbitration and such payments made. So if we put the money in the contingent fund, I think it would be a very much safer course. I merely submit this to the Senator as my suggestion upon the subject.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator suggested that to me in conversation a while ago, and it struck me as a very good way of reaching the question, but on reflecting for a few moments on this subject I think it would not be a wise thing, but would be the very reverse of it, because if we get into the habit of giving the President a sum for domestic purposes which he is not required to account for, I think it will be very difficult to get rid of such an appropriation.

As this is a domestic matter and an exceptional matter, as I tried to show, I think there can be no precedent in this case, because there can be no other cases like it unless the same thing should happen again in reference to the anthracite coal regions. It constitutes no precedent. But whatever is done about it should be done in an open way, and whatever we appropriate we should appropriate as we appropriate for other extraordinary conditions; for a famine, if you please, or an overflow of the Mississippi River, or for any other great emergency which suddenly comes up and requires a large expenditure.

So I think we had better adhere to the plan we have suggested. I am willing that a specific sum shall be put in this bill for those who are not holding office, and I am quite content to take the suggestion made by the Senator from Maine as to the amount, although I think $4,000 would be an ample allowance.

Mr. COCKRELL and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. I yield to the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I have listened very carefully to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and while he complained that I asked a long question and so many questions in a bunch that he would not undertake to answer all of them, I do not see that he answered any of them. And while I have always had the greatest admiration for that distinguished Senator, for the placidity and agility with which he pooh-poohs things sometimes and shoves them aside, I must confess that to my mind the substance of this whole contention has been more or less avoided by him—at least my contention.

I want an answer from that Senator or any other Senator who is willing to reply first as to the fact whether or not the coal barons, who brought on this trouble, are mining coal contrary to the laws and constitution of Pennsylvania; and if so, is there any existing remedy? I will ask that question as a concrete proposition. If the Senator from Iowa is ready to answer that question or is not ready to answer it, I would be glad for him to say yes or no.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, he requires me to answer "yes" or "no," which I will respectfully decline to do. If he will allow me I will answer him in my own way.

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure I will listen to the Senator. I do not want to have the appearance of coercing—I could not do that—or of corkscrewing any statement from the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. TILLMAN. I merely desire, if I can, to have him, if he is willing, and if he is unwilling, any other man who is willing or able, to reply "yes" or "no" as to whether or not what I have asked is true.

Mr. ALLISON. I know that somebody is mining coal in Pennsylvania, and I know that they resumed the mining of coal after this commission was appointed, and as a result of that mining we are receiving coal here now at the rate of a few tons a week, which is being doled out to us.

The people who are mining that coal are, I presume, engaged in a lawful enterprise. If they are miners, they are receiving compensation. If they are owners, they are selling the product. Now, whether what they may be doing is in accord with the statutes and the constitution of Pennsylvania or in violation of them it is impossible for me to know, as I am not familiar either with the constitution or the statutes of Pennsylvania. That is as far as I can answer the question. But I can not answer him as respects the questions which he now submits unless it would be to say that the committees of this body having the subjects in hand are, I have no doubt, dealing with them as best they can.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, having failed to get from the Senator from Iowa the information which I sought, I now submit the question to any Senator and all the Senators on the other side. I am perfectly willing to get light from this side, from anywhere, as to the facts. Is it true that these unlawful combinations and corporations have seized on an article of vital necessity to the people in their everyday life and comfort, involving almost their existence; and are they making it so dear that the conditions now existing are so uncomfortable and so unpleasant and dangerous that we, who are face to face with it, content ourselves with assisting the President in putting on what I may term merely a poultice? I do not criticise the President for his action at all. I think it was very laudable, having no power as the Executive, he should endeavor to bring about some compromise or arrangement by which the people first should get coal. But does that relieve us of our duty to see that this thing does not happen again?

Mr. ALLISON. Does the bill propose to relieve us of our duty in any way?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, this bill, as I have characterized it two or three times, is merely the appropriation of money for a purpose, laudable in itself possibly, but merely as a confession of our imbecility or our inability or our cowardice to take the question up and deal with it ourselves as it is our duty to deal with it. We are postponing and putting it off and leaving it to an unconstitutionally constituted commission, which we recognize and make lawful by our action here in appropriating money for it, and thereby set a precedent which, as the Senator from Maine has pointed out, is a very dangerous one.

I want to ask Senators if they are going to be content to have this session of Congress pass out of existence and end and leave the country liable to have another coal strike in the bituminous regions or in the anthracite and bituminous regions both, and enable those who may feel that they have the power and the right to monopolize that business or those producing facilities to lay the people of the country under tribute, and we who are the representatives and protectors of the people stand here idle and adjourn and go away and only turn on some "light?" We do not even, so far as I see, expect to get much light from this commission in time for the present session of Congress to do anything. These people will take testimony, under the ordinary experience we have had with such bodies, indefinitely. At least, we will certainly have gone away before we will receive any benefit whatever or any intelligence or any information from the facts which they will elicit. Their report will come to us next December. I should like to have——

Mr. MASON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALDRICH in the chair). Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TILLMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. MASON. I wish to make a brief statement in regard to what seems to worry the Senator somewhat, and possibly I can bring him peace of mind, and he may go on and let the Government pay for the commission which has been appointed, waiving the question as to whether the President had any power to do it. I simply wish to make the statement that it was done with the approval of all the people, and there can be no possible doubt that the people are entirely willing to trust the Executive to make due and proper allowance or compensation.

I want to say to the Senator that if he has confidence in the gentleman who now has the floor—and I am sure he has in some ways—I have prepared a bill which I intend to present to the Senate within the next few days and have referred to the Judiciary Committee, which, I think, will relieve his anxiety, temporarily at least. Without taking the time of the Senate to explain either the intention of the bill or its merits, I will say it simply provides that when these great mines are not being operated the Government of the United States, through its Attorney-General, may ask for the appointment of a receiver to operate the same for the benefit of the people; and under that clause of the Constitution which provides that we may pass laws for the general welfare, I believe it to be a bill entirely within the power of Congress to pass.

While I quite agree with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] that the matter has no special place in this discussion, yet when the Senator from South Carolina, in that vigorous way he has, turns to every gentleman upon this side of the Chamber and wants an answer, I feel that I owe it to myself to state that in response to the petitions of over 50,000 people in Illinois that bill has been prepared and will be submitted in good faith, and it will have the very best effort I can give to secure its adoption as a law of this country.

I think I can satisfy the members of the committee and the Senate that it is clearly within the power of Congress, under decisions already rendered by the Supreme Court, to pass such a law, so that the thing which the Senator from South Carolina now fears may not happen again. Then, when the time comes that, either through the cupidity of one side or the stupidity of the other side, the great mines of the country are stopped, the Government, as it has in many other cases, may go into a court of equity and ask for the appointment of a receiver, who shall operate the mines not in the interest of labor, not in the interest of capital, but in the interest of the third party, the public, accounting both to labor and capital in a proper way. I have answered the Senator, so far as I can, and I hope he will be satisfied and will let us pass this bill to pay the obligations we have already incurred for the distinguished men who are now giving their services.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, as between the distinguished Senator from Illinois and a distinguished gentleman, formerly a Senator from New York, one of whom proposes to seize the mines and operate them by the Government and the other of whom proposes to buy them and control them absolutely, I will not enter upon a discussion of the ownership or control by the Government, by orders of courts of equity or from other sources, of the coal mines. I hope to get a reply from somebody in denial of the oft-repeated assertion which we hear every day or have heard for months that the coal barons of Pennsylvania are now and have been operating those mines contrary to the constitution and laws of that State, and I wanted somebody somewhere to tell me whether or not under the Sherman antitrust act the Attorney-General of the United States could have gone into some court somewhere and given relief.

I still wait for an answer to that inquiry. First, is the statement true as to the unconstitutional possession and working of these mines? Secondly, if it be true, is there in existence a statute which would enable our Attorney-General to give the people relief?

Now, I have two prongs up here in the air, and any gentleman who wants to get on either of them is welcome. I will not say that they are the prongs of a pitchfork, but they are certainly problems. They present a dilemma, and I still ask for a reply to either question, or both, from the assembled wisdom and the trusted agents of the people who, in the last election, were authorized to continue possession and administration of the Government. If the people are satisfied with this condition, as they seem to be, I surely am not dissatisfied, or I have no right to be.

I have no criticism to make of the President for endeavoring in his capacity as a public official, as well as an eminent citizen, to bring about some condition of amelioration. I am ready to pay the men who have been appointed anything reasonable and proper, but I do not get any light or any encouragement to hope that there will be any relief from the conditions which produced this situation and which may produce another.

I would ask, further, if it is the purpose to encourage the obtaining of information and the reaching of some basis of compromises between labor and capital, why it would not be a good thing for the Congress to have a commission, constituted under its own regulations and with its own instructions, to take up this whole question of the conflict between labor and capital and the combinations which exist now, the destruction of competition by monopoly under the protection of the tariff, and all those things, and let us see whether some scheme of practical relief and statesmanlike dealing with this subject can not be reached.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Iowa will accept the amendment and agree to reduce the per diem expenses to $10 a day. I claim that $15 a day is an outrageous price. It is more, and we know it, than any one of those men will expect. They are not occupied every day. They are at home several days at a time. They do not have to travel any great distance. If we establish the precedent of paying over $10 a day for the expenses of any officer of the United States it is a dangerous one and will come back to haunt us hereafter.

We provide a per diem for a great many officers and the per diem for traveling expenses is an enormous charge upon the Government. In order to prevent the necessity of every little item being subjected to the scrutiny of the accounting officers of the Treasury Department, who would suspend about two-thirds of the accounts that would be presented as not being necessary, we fix a given amount.

There are persons who are in the service of the Government on very important interests who are traveling all the time—there is scarcely a day when they are not traveling—and not one solitary one of them gets over $10 a day, and very few get $10 a day. The rule is $3 and $4, and some few of them get $5 and pay their expenses. The highest per diem for expenses is given to United States judges, and that is when they are away from home.

Mr. BACON. And that is limited.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is limited, not exceeding $10 a day. But here, when men are performing duties within a short distance—most of them, at least—from home, we are setting a precedent that is dangerous. I can not vote for it, and I will not do it under any circumstances.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. Mr. President, I desire to make a suggestion to the Senator from Iowa in charge of the bill. I see by the bill as it was proposed to be amended by the Senate committee there is provision made for the payment of the expenses of the members of the commission who are not officers in the civil or military service of the Government, but there is no provision made for the payment of the reasonable expenses of the employees and assistant recorders. It seems to me that it is proper——

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Senate has already adopted an amendment providing $10 per day each for the assistant recorders.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I did not know that that had been done.

Mr. ALLISON. That amendment has already been adopted.

Mr. McLAURIN of Mississippi. I have an amendment which I wanted to offer, to make some provision for the clerks.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it seems to me the debate is getting a great way from this simple appropriation bill. What struck me was that we ought to fix the salary absolutely. I do not care myself to go into a discussion of the power of the President in this matter. The President found a very unpleasant condition existing. Nearly 150,000 men quit their labor last May and continued away from work until October. The controversy was whether they were being properly compensated for their labor. That was a question between the operators of the mines and the people. I do not understand that the President claimed, as President of the United States, the slightest authority. On the contrary, he disclaimed it. Simply as a citizen, I understand, he approached this subject. I happen to know that just at that time a very distinguished citizen of the State of New York had attempted to do the same thing—to negotiate, as he thought, with some prospect of success. Whether or not his expectations would have been realized no one knows.

I believe everybody in the country was delighted when the President of the United States used his great influence to bring about some arrangement between the coal miners and the coal operators. I was not present, of course, and I do not know, but I think the President must have been a man of a good deal of patience and good temper that he did not lose his temper by the way he was treated by the coal operators, and if the laboring people had not been better represented by their representatives than the coal men seemed to be, it appears to me that there would not have been any arrangement made.

I do not know what the power of the President may be to appoint a commission. I think he may appoint a commission for acquiring information, perhaps, whenever he sees fit. Of course, he has no power to pay the commission. That is a question to be determined by Congress. If we think the commission was wisely and properly appointed, there is a moral obligation at least to make proper compensation and provision for the support of the commission.

I do not know whether the coal operators of Pennsylvania are violating any Pennsylvania statutes or the constitution of the State, and if I did know that they are doing it I am not sufficiently informed myself as a lawyer as to the method by which we are to resent their failure to comply with the statutes or the constitution of Pennsylvania. That seems to me to belong to Pennsylvania, and I doubt very much whether under the general welfare clause we can invade the jurisdiction of Pennsylvania and take it out of their hands.

I suppose we might amend the Constitution and provide for all such things, but we have not done that. However, the President appointed a commission which it has been said is satisfactory to everybody. I have heard no complaint of the commission myself. I think the President was somewhat restricted in appointing the commission, owing to the fact that both sides put a limitation upon the character of the appointees. Therefore, the President, perhaps, did not make such a selection as he might have made. Yet I do not think anyone ought to raise any question about the selection. They are able men, they are good men, and they are doing an excellent service for the Government and for the country.

I do not know whether, as has been suggested, there is to be a repetition of this strike. I do not know, if that is to occur, but that the sovereignty of Pennsylvania may be called into operation to take the property out of the hands of these people and put it into the hands of the State or somewhere where the public will be properly relieved. But none of those questions are here now. The only question before us is as to whether we will make proper compensation to the members of the commission, who have left their business, and some of them their private business, to perform this duty.

I think the public ought to feel a sense of gratitude to some of the gentlemen who have gone on that commission and who have entered upon a very unpleasant service, and have done so simply in the interest of the public. I do not think we ought to higgle very much about the price we shall pay them. I should like to have it fixed, because I do not believe in allowing the President or anybody else to fix salaries. That, in my judgment, belongs to Congress.

I think it would not be out of the way to put a moderate restriction as to the time when the commission shall report; not because I am afraid of this commission, but as a general principle I think the appointment of commissions ought not to be for an indefinite time. It ought to be fixed and determinate. But all those things ought to have been considered and determined in the committee.

It seems to me that the best thing we can do is to accept the proposition which I now understand comes from the chairman of the committee—fix the salary definitely, at least so far as the amount is per day, and quit. If we give these people $10 a day or $12 a day, which I think was the last suggestion, we will give them only a trifle over $4,000—$4,380—provided they sit a year. If we should give them $15 a day we would be paying them $5,475 per annum. The commission is one of great importance and some of the men on it of such character that I believe it will actually be a sacrifice to them if we give them $15 a day. I do not believe we should go beyond a reasonable compensation for this public service, and I think we had better not attempt to bring into this discussion very difficult and unsettled questions, and question-which will be unsettled for a long time, as to trusts, etc., but we should dispose of this one question as a business proposition and quit.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] having charge of the regular order, or at least who is pressing it, whether he will not consent now to finish the Coal Strike Commission bill? I think it can be closed up in a short time.

Mr. HALE. Temporarily laying aside the pending bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; temporarily laying aside the regular order.

Mr. QUAY. I regret to say that I feel it to be my duty to resist the request of the Senator from Iowa for the present. I think, however, later in the day he will have an opportunity to complete the bill he has in charge.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill which is the unfinished business is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. QUAY. We are ready for a vote. What is the question upon the bill, Mr. President?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Committee on Territories having been withdrawn, the question is on the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. On the passage of the bill.

Mr. QUAY. Let us have the question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE and Mr. NELSON addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, do I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is ready now to go on with the discussion of the bill which he champions?

Mr. QUAY. We are ready to proceed to vote now on the bill and pass it finally this afternoon, if a majority of the Senate are in favor of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did not hear the Senator.

Mr. QUAY. I said that the friends of the bill now pending are prepared to take the vote upon it this afternoon and pass it finally this afternoon, if the gentlemen who are opposed to it are ready to proceed to the issue.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, all the majority members of the committee, and in addition to them a number of other Senators, desire to address the Senate upon this measure and upon the substitute which was yesterday withdrawn with notice that it would be at a later time offered. I do not suppose the Senator means that he and those who are with him are willing or desire to stand up and be counted upon a measure of so grave consequence without regard to the facts in the case or the arguments upon them. The reason why I can not understand that to be the Senator's attitude is that that would be to pay to those who are with him a sorry compliment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The view that is taken by ourselves, and which is, I suppose, shared by the Senator from Pennsylvania, is that this is a measure which, without unnecessary delay, ought to be and will be discussed in good faith, each Senator who desires to lay before the Senate his views upon the matter having an opportunity to do it. That, at least, Mr. President, is the attitude of the majority of the committee.

With reference to those who wish to speak upon this measure, every member, as I said, of the majority of the committee desires to express his views. Possibly the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] will open the debate upon our side. He was ill the first two days of the week, though able to get here, and is to-day ill in bed, although he is making such preparation as circumstances permit. Every member of the majority of the committee has been at work with a diligence to which even the Senator from Pennsylvania will testify, and they have also been at work faithfully preparing to present to the Senate their views upon this question. Some of them are here, and will speak for themselves. The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who offered the committee substitute desires to address the Senate. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BURNHAM] is now preparing for the same purpose. Outside of the committee a number—I may say a large number—of Senators have expressed to me their desire to address the Senate so soon as they can possibly examine the facts in the case, the data on both sides to which they have access, and the report of the committee.

But none of them, Mr. President, are ready to proceed to-day. Both reports were made but yesterday. The evidence in support of the report of the committee was ordered to be printed yesterday and the printing will not be done until to-night. So there has been no opportunity, as the Senator will readily see and as the Senate will see, for any person to inform himself upon this question. Therefore, we are not ready now to proceed. However, I can say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, and to the rest of the Senate, that without any unnecessary delay at all, but with all diligence, Senators who desire to address the Senate upon this measure will do so at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I have no reply whatever to make to the insinuation that the friends of the bill are ignorant as to the conditions in these Territories or that they are expected to derive wonderful light on the subject from the report of the majority of the committee. As to me, as I said before, I understand the position as well as does the Senator from Indiana or his colleagues of the majority of the Committee on Territories, and I am ready to vote now. I am inclined to the opinion that a majority of the Senate, who are in favor of the bill, are sufficiently intelligent and well informed to act upon it this afternoon.

There is no desire, however, to unduly press the Senator from Indiana or the majority of the Committee on Territories into a discussion of the bill if we can have any assurance that at any time in the near future we shall have a vote upon it. If we can not do this, but have to fight constantly for a vote, we may as well fight this afternoon. If the Senator from Indiana will name any time in the future—I will not say even in the near future—when a vote can be reached upon this bill, I am ready to agree to any date he may suggest.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator says, "if they have to fight constantly for a vote." In answer to that, I think it is proper for me to say that that is hardly appropriate now, when the discussion has not yet begun, nor has there been an opportunity for it to begin.

I have said to the Senator that this measure shall proceed without unnecessary delay, except such as is required by Senators to express their views and prepare to express them. The Senator knows, and no one so well, that it would be perfectly impossible at this day, and a thing perhaps unprecedented in the Senate, certainly so during the very brief time I have been here, that at the beginning of a discussion, before a single speech has yet been made on either side, a day should be fixed when the vote shall be taken. It is perfectly impossible for the Senator and myself, or any Senator, to say how many Senators desire to speak, how long they wish to speak, or what preparation they require. The only thing that the Senator should require from me and that he has a right to require, and I recognize it without his asking, is that the matter shall proceed as rapidly as Senators can prepare to present their views. It is manifestly impossible at this time for any person to intelligently fix a day for the final vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have not the honor to be a member of the Committee on Territories, but in the few years I have been here I have seen a great many bills brought into the Senate which there was great anxiety to pass with speed, and I have seen a number of very hardly contested bills in which there was great interest felt on one side or the other. But I confess that this is the first time I have ever heard a request made to fix a time for a vote and to insist upon the discussion of a bill when the report of the committee is not even yet in print, nor is the testimony which the committee has taken in print.

This bill may be a perfectly simple one and one that ought to go through on reading, but it would seem to me to be a measure of great importance. I do not desire to be unreasonable at all, but I should like to have an opportunity to read the report of the committee. I should like to have an opportunity to read the minority report. I should like to have an opportunity to look at the testimony.

It seems to me that the admission of three States into the American Union is a matter of sufficient importance to allow us a reasonable time to inform ourselves. I have had neither the time nor the opportunity as yet. I should like not only to look into the question, but I hope to discuss it, if my views remain as to two of the Territories what they are to-day. However, it is utterly out of the question for me to deal with the subject, upon which the report of the committee is not yet upon our tables and the testimony in regard to which is not yet printed.

I am sure that I sympathize with the impatience of the Senator from Pennsylvania. At the last session there were two bills which fell to me to take charge of. One was the Philippine tariff bill, a measure as simple as possible. The other was the Philippine government bill, which was a measure not only of much importance, but of large complication. We spent twelve weeks in discussing those two measures. The Senators who had charge of the minority measure were kind enough to say at the end of the discussion that they thought I had been considerate in the matter of debate. But, whether I was considerate or impatient, I certainly did not come into the Senate and ask the Senate to fix a time to take a vote before a report had been printed, before a line of the testimony was in print, or before a single speech had been heard.

It seems to me that it is a well-recognized privilege of the Senate that the members of a committee who are presenting an important measure of this kind should have at least the opportunity to defend their report, and it does not seem to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana is unreasonable at all. I have not the least desire to delay this bill unduly; far from it. I should like, however, to have an opportunity to examine the facts and the report and an opportunity to prepare myself to speak upon it, as I hope to do.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, speaking for the minority of the committee, I desire to say that they are ready to vote now on this question. They feel that they are sufficiently informed. And a majority of those on the other side of the Chamber are ready to vote now. We do not desire, however, to suppress any discussion that may be desired and that may be proper to be given on either side of the Chamber, but we certainly ought to facilitate this matter.

I appreciate what was said by the Senator from Massachusetts who has just taken his seat, when he said we ought to have the report here to examine and to learn the facts in connection with this matter. I think so, too.

It will be remembered, Mr. President, that on yesterday, and even on a former occasion, I asked that the report from the committee should be made, in order that the minority—and I am one of them—might make their minority report. Now, that report was made yesterday, and it was read. Nearly an hour and a half was spent, or two hours, in the reading of it. That report has gone to the printer. It is not in the RECORD. We have not seen it and can not see it, notwithstanding I have been urging it. How can the minority reply to a report that has been presented by the majority, if they desire to do so, unless they see that report? To my surprise, after having been read yesterday, instead of being published, as I think it should have been, in the RECORD, I find right at the termination of this question yesterday by the Senate the following note:

[The report is withheld for revision and will be published hereafter.]

Giving no indication as to when it will be published I should like to have the Senator from Massachusetts gratified in seeing that report and to hear the minority report, but he can not expect the minority to present their report until all the points are shown them in the report of the majority, which, as I said, was read yesterday, but it is not published.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think we all understand that, whatever may be said outside about the Senate, in the end on all important matters we do business. We take our way of doing it. The newspapers say we ought to have the previous question. We do not think so, and in our own way, after full discussion, we never fail to come to a vote upon every contested large matter.

It is rather the habit to say that the Senate is too much of a deliberative body; that it wastes time in speech-making; but the record shows that out of it the Senate's way is a good way to do the public business. We do not have the crowding, the forcing, and obliging men to vote without discussion that they have in some other bodies. Not only have we no previous question, but nobody undertakes on a controverted question to push matters unduly and to the inconvenience of Senators.

I am sorry that the veteran Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], in charge of this bill, has intimated that he can not consent to any further delay for debate, and that if a Senator is ill and can not speak, we shall not adjourn——

Mr. QUAY. The Senator is mistaken. I did not so intimate.

Mr. HALE. The Senator's general intimation, while he did not refer to the Senator from Vermont being ill, was that his side was ready for the vote this afternoon, and he suggested what I think must have struck every other Senator as it did the Senator from Massachusetts, as a remarkable thing, that now, before the lists are open, we should agree upon a time when the vote shall be taken; and I am sorry that the venerable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE], urging against any kind of reasonable delay, should say to us that his side of the Chamber wanted to vote now.

Why, Mr. President, that side of the Chamber is more interested than any other Senators here in not being unduly pushed or crowded. There have been times heretofore, and there will be times hereafter, when that Senator and other Senators upon the minority side, the Democratic side, will be appealing to this side not by force of arms to push the decision of a matter until it has been thoroughly exhausted by debate.

Mr. BATE. The Senator does not quote me correctly when he says that I said that we were ready to vote. I meant after discussion.

Mr. HALE. I do not understand that the Senator made any threat, but he said his side was ready to vote now and willing to go upon record.

Mr. BATE. I said distinctly that we on this side are not divided on this question, however it may be with Senators on that side.

Mr. HALE. I am quoting the Senator correctly in saying that he said his side was ready to vote. I was sorry that he should say that, because I have never been in favor, when the lines were drawn the other way and the Senator was in the minority, of not giving every opportunity for debate.

Now, here is a remarkable case—I appeal to the good sense of the Senators—which has just come up for action. No one has had any chance whatever to examine either of the reports. I have not. I know I can say nothing to illumine the subject, but I am very much interested in it, and I want to help discuss it. I have not seen a shred of testimony, I am not ready, nor can any Senator be ready, to act upon this matter now.

Mr. President, we have been ready for a speech to-day, which would have taken perhaps only an hour or two. If the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] had not been ill and had been able to be here he would have been ready to open the debate, as properly he would as representing the majority of the committee.

Now, what we ought to do is not to let any person have his own way in this matter. We are situated here where we want to get at the facts, and want the time to do it, not that we expect to prevent a vote, but we want time to present to the Senate and to the country the reasons why some of us think this is a wrong bill. There are a thousand things that are pushing upon Senators; they have business before the departments, and the thing for us to do, and what we ought to do, is to adjourn over from to-day until Monday, and then let everybody be in readiness with his speech, and let it be understood that Senators shall then be ready to debate this question.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. I did not understand the proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] as the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] evidently understood it. I did not understand the Senator from Pennsylvania to insist on a day being fixed for a vote, but what I understood him to say was that if there was any assurance that we could have a vote in any reasonable time he would not insist upon the bill being kept constantly before the Senate. We are assured by the chairman of the committee that we shall have debate, but it seems to have been carefully avoided on the part of the Senators who are on that side of the question to make any statement that there should be a vote.

So far as I am concerned, I do not think there ought to be any effort to suppress debate. I believe that every member of the Senate who wishes to discuss the question ought to have an opportunity to do so; but we all know that if both sides on this question are willing to say there shall be a vote in a reasonable time that will mean a good deal; and I believe that was what the Senator from Pennsylvania asked for.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator ever known, in his large experience, that the Senate has been asked in any way to designate the time when a vote should be taken upon a subject-matter that had not been up? It seems to me to be rather unduly pushing matters that before a question is even up, before it is opened——

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. But a good many months ago the Senate agreed that this bill should come up on Wednesday of this week.

Mr. HALE. It has come up.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It has, in a way. It has been made the regular order; but the committee has not been ready to take a solitary step in the matter. While there has been a technical compliance with the agreement, the bill has not been before the Senate in the sense of being ready for consideration and discussion.

Mr. HALE. It could not be before the Senate until yesterday.

Mr. ALDRICH. Will the Senator from Maine allow me?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Committee on Territories were instructed to investigate this question, which they have done thoroughly, as I understood. The testimony and report were submitted to the Senate for the first time yesterday, and no Senator here has had an opportunity of even reading it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The report was read to the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The report was read to the Senate, but the testimony has not been read, and no Senator knows what is in it.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. If the Senator will pardon me a moment further, this is exactly the condition, as I understand it. The Senator from Pennsylvania, or some one, grew apprehensive from this indefinite talk of a vote as being in the future, without a solitary word being said by any man in the Senate that there should be a vote at any time between now and the 3d of March. So far as I am concerned, if the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, or the Senator from Rhode Island will say that there shall be a vote on this question by the 3d of March, it would be considered quite a boon so far as my own individual feeling is concerned.

Mr. HALE. The Senator knows that as to a measure which has not been launched, in charge of the Senator from Indiana or anybody else, or if the Senator from Arkansas was in charge of a tariff bill, or if he were opposing a tariff bill, he would not want to state that there should be a vote at a certain time before the bill had been discussed. Nobody expects to get a vote on this bill to-day or to-morrow. Here we are confronted with the fact that the Senator who expected to make a speech is ill. To-morrow will be Friday and the next day Saturday. There is no end to the business that Senators have to attend to in the early part of the month of December at the departments. I have never known any instance thus early in a session when we did not adjourn over from Thursday until Monday to give Senators an opportunity to attend to departmental business. On Monday we can come in here and let the Senator from Indiana and the Senator from Pennsylvania fight it out on the bill. That is the fair thing.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. As suggested by the Senator, I will say that were I in charge of the opposition to a bill and were I satisfied that I was in the minority, that my side would be beaten on a vote, and I was very much in favor of beating the bill, I would resort to exactly the tactics that are now being adopted in regard to this matter.

Mr. HALE. This is as to debate and not as to tactics. The tactics have not yet begun. [Laughter.] We are simply asking now that the Senate do what it invariably does in a case of this kind.

Mr. HOAR. May I interrupt the Senator from Maine to ask a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I have been out of the Chamber, and perhaps what I ask has been stated already; but I understood the Senator just now to say that the Senator who was ready to speak to-day is ill. Now, I ask the Senator from Maine if the Senator who was to speak is not the member of the committee who had charge of opening the debate and explaining the views of the committee to the Senate?

Mr. HALE. It was settled that the Senator from Vermont should open the debate.

Mr. HOAR. I did not know that had been stated.

Mr. HALE. I did not state that.

Mr. President, I am inclined to see what the Senate thinks at this particular stage, under these conditions, of insisting upon going on, by moving that the Senate, when it adjourns to-day, adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. QUAY. I rise to discuss that question, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. QUAY. It is a motion to adjourn to meet on Monday next, and not a mere motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day——

Mr. HALE. I will withdraw that motion if the Senator from Pennsylvania desires to speak. We have been talking on in this informal way; I do not want to shut the Senator off, and therefore for the present I withdraw the motion.

Mr. QUAY. My understanding was that gentlemen upon this side of the Chamber and gentlemen upon the other side had agreed that there should be a session to-morrow. Now, what is the exact proposition of the Senator from Indiana—to go on to-morrow?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, Mr. President, I have made no proposition. I have simply stated the condition, and stated that it is the expectation of the members of the committee to proceed just as soon as they can get ready to address the Senate. Some of the Senators on the committee are here now, and I have no doubt can speak for themselves. I see other Senators here now who have told me they intended to address the Senate on this bill. I have made no proposition, but I have stated the conditions. Senators will go on at the earliest possible moment they can prepare to do so and without unnecessary delay, but they are not ready to go on now.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, this bill has been made the regular order, the unfinished business. My actual intendment when the arrangement was made and the actual agreement made, not probably on this floor, but outside, was that it should continue in order until it was disposed of and be displaced by nothing. That was in June last. From that day to this these gentlemen have been considering this question, and if they are going to debate it in the Senate, they certainly ought to be ready now.

The question is not a new one; it is not unknown to the country or the Senate. For fifty years New Mexico has been hammering here for admission, and for fifty years its clamor has been heard in the Senate almost winter after winter. As to the admission of the other Territories, that question was thoroughly considered in the national conventions of both parties and argued out before the American people, and it is remarkable, it is wonderful, that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], who was a delegate in the Republican national convention of 1900, and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], who is familiar with all that transpired in this body, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who presided in that national convention and put the question on this resolution for the admission of these Territories, is not now ready to proceed to debate the question and has not yet made up his mind whether he was right or not in advocating and supporting that measure in that convention. If the Republican party in their platform can lie to the people about the admission of the Territories, they can lie as to any other proposition in their platforms and are unworthy of popular confidence.

The air is full, Mr. President, of rumors as to the method of the defeat of this bill. It is rife in the corridors around the Senate that it is to be defeated, not by votes, but by obstruction; that from day to day debate is to be postponed or protracted until the patience of the advocates of statehood is wearied out, until one by one its votes are picked off, until other great questions, appropriations, trusts, probably national questions come before the Senate, which will force it to the rear. It is therefore not surprising that those who think with me on this question insist upon using every practicable moment that we can possibly consume in its consideration.

As to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], who is to be put forward in assertion of the views of the majority on this bill, is unwell and unfit to proceed, that is, of course, an argument that appeals to the personality of every Senator. I do not wish to attempt to force a debate under these circumstances, but I think there ought to be some understanding, or some agreement with the Committee on Territories as to the actual course of proceeding upon this bill. It is now before us, and under the agreement will be before us from day to day, and it ought to be discussed and disposed of as soon as possible. That was the agreement of the Senate.

As to the motion to adjourn over to-morrow, we may as well take a test vote upon that motion as on any, to ascertain what this agreement of the Senate is supposed to have meant. If the Senator wishes the yeas and nays upon the motion, I am willing.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, as the illness of my colleague [Mr. DILLINGHAM] has been referred to, I would state that for two or three days he has been quite indisposed, and last night he called in a physician. From what the physician says, I think that within two days he will be all right again. He will not be ready to speak to-morrow, but his physician says that his indisposition is such that it will require only a day or two of rest and treatment to remedy.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I think we can all appreciate the situation, as it has been explained by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. I think we can all understand that there will really be no time lost in the consideration of this bill if we can now agree that it shall go over until Monday, to which time it is proposed by the Senator from Maine that the Senate shall adjourn when we adjourn to-day. That will give everybody an opportunity to read all of these reports; and I think that is important, for while it is true, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] has stated, that this is an old question with which we are all in a general way familiar, yet it is true that it is now presented somewhat differently from what it has ever been presented before.

We have a very elaborate report, which was read at the desk only yesterday. I heard a part of it. Our attention has been called to the fact that it does not appear to-day in the RECORD. I presume it will appear in the next edition of the RECORD, and the Senator from Indiana confirms me in that opinion. I should like to read that report. I expect to take some part in the discussion of this question. I should like to be familiar with all of the facts as they are to be presented on this hearing. I want to know what is in the report that was read yesterday and what is to be in the other reports that are to be submitted. So I hope the Senator from Pennsylvania will agree that we may adjourn over until Monday, and that this bill shall be taken up on that day with the understanding—and that certainly will be fair—that on Monday we shall be ready to proceed with it and discuss it and continue to discuss it from day to day until we get to a vote in the ordinary way.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I notice in the RECORD that the report of the majority of the committee, which was read yesterday, is not printed, but a note by the reporter explains that it is withheld for correction. I do not exactly understand that. When a report has been written and read to the Senate, it ought to appear just as it was read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I can enlighten the Senator upon that point, Mr. President. The report, I have no doubt, will appear in to-morrow morning's RECORD. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there were a large number of tables of figures in that report, which, on account of the limited time that the committee had, were gotten immediately and put in as soon as they came from the Department. I wanted to see that all of those figures were compared and verified, because I do not know whether the stenographer made any mistake or not. They were gotten just as fast as might be. Besides, I did not myself get an opportunity until 12 o'clock last night—I do not know why the reporter put in that it was withheld for revision; but it was his own motion—to look over the proofs, as I always do, and, I presume, as the Senator from Missouri always does. There will not be any delay in the printing of the report, and, further, the report ordered to be printed yesterday, on the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I think, will be done by to-morrow; and even if the proofs are not ready the testimony will, I think, be printed by to-morrow, anyhow. The Printing Office has not gotten through with it.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the Senator think, then, that the report will be printed so that it can be seen to-morrow?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, yes; not only in the RECORD, but also in more convenient and larger form.

Mr. COCKRELL. How about the minority report?

Mr. BATE. We will bring that in as soon as possible. The report of the majority of the committee seems to have been kept out of the RECORD for the purpose of revision, but I do not know that there is any authority for doing that. After a report has been read to the Senate, it seems to me, it passes from the hands of the committee and can not be withheld for revision.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, that has been explained as clearly as it can be.

Mr. BATE. Pardon me. As to the minority report, as soon as we get hold of the revised majority report we shall at once go to work upon it, and I think we shall have it ready to print on the next morning or the morning after.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I want to make a suggestion to facilitate business. I do not think this is the time to fix a day when this question can be voted upon. I do not think that has ever been done; but we ought to be able to fix now the time when we can get the information which all Senators desire for the discussion of this question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think it will be in print to-morrow.

Mr. COCKRELL. Then I think we ought to adjourn over until Monday. But if we adjourn over until Monday and the minority report has not been made, it will not be in print, and will not even be presented to the Senate, unless leave is given to present it and have it printed in the meantime.

Mr. BATE. I have already gotten leave to print it at any time during the proceedings on this question. I will prepare it as soon as the report of the majority is printed. I think it will be ready in time to appear in Sunday morning's RECORD.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There will be no objection, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to have an understanding, so that we shall have no trouble. I do not think it unreasonable under the circumstances to ask that this matter shall be postponed until Monday. There never has been any trouble heretofore to pass any measure that ought to be passed by the Senate, and I think we shall be able to act upon this bill without any trouble when full and fair opportunity has been given to Senators to be heard upon it.

Mr. QUAY. This measure, Mr. President, ought to pass; yet the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] will find that it will not pass without a great deal of trouble, unless I am mistaken about its future progress in this Senate.

I have said, however, that the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts was one that appealed to the personality of every Senator. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] who was to lead the debate is sick. There is no question as to whether or not we ought to otherwise proceed; but he is sick abed. If that is the case, and if it is the fact that he can not be in the Senate to-morrow to initiate the debate, I have no objection to the bill going over until Monday afternoon and then coming up in its regular order; but I will expect the opposition to the bill to have some one ready to take the floor on Monday, and I will insist on a vote if there is any further delay.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is right about that. There ought to be somebody ready to go on with the debate on Monday, and I have no doubt somebody will be found to do so. Therefore, I now move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator pardon me a moment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. While I consented that the bill might go over, I do not want the status of the bill interfered with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will remain the unfinished business if it is in the power of the Chair to keep it there; and the Chair thinks it is.

The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to have an order made that the statehood bill be reprinted as it now stands before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for a reprint of the bill known as the statehood bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

ANTHRACITE COAL STRIKE COMMISSION.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the regular order may be informally laid aside so that we may proceed with the appropriation bill which was under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15372. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment submitted by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "President," it is proposed to insert "not exceeding $12 per day for the time employed;" so as to read:

> And for such compensation of the seven members of said commission, its employees, and the two assistant recorders, as may be fixed by the President, not exceeding $12 per day for the time employed.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] that as respects the commissioners who are not in the public employ there shall be a fixed sum, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], in the remarks made by him, suggested that the sum ought to be $4,000. I am willing to accept that.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. At the rate of $4,000?

Mr. ALLISON. No; I mean that they shall have $4,000 each for their services.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. If the Senator will let it read "a sum not to exceed $4,000," it seems to me that would be the proper thing to do. Then, if they are engaged only for a very short time, if they got through in a month, the President would have it in his discretion to pay them a less sum than that. If the work of the commission continued for a year, then he would probably pay them the $4,000. I think there would be no objection to that, and I would accept such a provision in lieu of my amendment. At any rate, it seems to be the opinion of Senators on both sides of the Chamber that some amount should be fixed, and it seems to me that the bill ought to read "a sum not to exceed $4,000." If you want to give them a lump sum, then the President can determine. If the commission conclude their labors very soon, I take it for granted he would not pay them so much as $4,000; and I think he ought not to pay them so much as that. I submit to the Senator from Iowa that that would be the proper way to arrange it.

Mr. ALLISON. If the President is to fix the salaries I hope he will be allowed to fix them—I am quite sure his discretion can be relied upon—and I think if we are to fix these salaries we ought to fix them. We should fix some sum. I think $4,000 is a reasonable sum for the work the commissioners will be called upon to do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert, "The members of said commission shall receive as compensation $4,000 each for their services."

Mr. BERRY. As I understood the Secretary in reading the bill, although I may have misunderstood him, he read "the seven members." Now, I submit to the Senator that notwithstanding he has stricken out the provision repealing that law, if it is left to read "seven members," then the men who are at present holding office would also get the compensation.

Mr. ALLISON. The word "seven" has been stricken out.

Mr. BERRY. The Secretary read it "seven."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No amendment has yet been adopted to the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest that we proceed regularly to consider the amendments as they appear in the print.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, after the word "dollars," it is proposed to insert "or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to read:

That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 1, to strike out, at the end of line 12, the word "seven;" on page 2, line 1, after the word "the," to strike out "two;" and in line 2, after the word "recorders," to insert "who are not officers or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government;" so as to read:

And for such compensation of the members of said commission, its employees, and the assistant recorders, who are not officers or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government, as may be fixed by the President.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 4, after the word "President," to strike out:

Such compensation to be paid notwithstanding the provisions of sections 1763, 1764, and 1765 of the Revised Statutes, or section 3 of the act of June 20, 1874, chapter 328.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa wish to offer an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment to strike out, beginning in line 4 and ending in line 8 with the word "twenty-eight," should be agreed to. That strikes out the provision inserted by the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, if I can have the approval of the Senate, I will ask that, in line 1, page 2, the words "its employees and the two assistant recorders" be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On page 2, lines 1 and 2, the word "two" has already been stricken out. Does the Senator from Iowa offer an amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. What I wish to do is to fix the salaries of the members of the commission who are not Government officers. So I move to strike out those words for the time being and will have them reinserted elsewhere.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "commission," it is proposed to strike out the words "its employees and the assistant recorders."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move to strike out of the amendment as it stands now the words "or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to insert "$4,000 each" after the word "commission," in line 1, page 2. Then I will arrange the subsequent phraseology to meet that amendment, if it is agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 1, after the word "commission," it is proposed to insert "$4,000 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. That does not complete it. Is that agreed to?

Mr. BERRY. I do not agree to it, but the Senate has agreed to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Iowa that on the first page, line 12, the last line, where it says "and for such compensation," the word "such" be stricken out.

Mr. ALLISON. Let the word "such" be stricken out.

Mr. COCKRELL. And let the word "the" be inserted; so as to read "for the compensation."

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; "for the compensation."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that amendment will be agreed to. The amendment in lines 2 and 3, on page 2, has been agreed to, and is now, in Committee of the Whole, a part of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It should be modified so as to read:

And for the compensation of the members of said commission who are not officers in the civil or military service of the Government, $4,000 each.

I move to insert those words after the word "commission."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, that amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Then it will read:

And for the compensation of the members of said commission who are not officers in the civil or military service of the Government, $4,000 each.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I move to amend the bill by inserting after the words "four thousand dollars each" the words:

And for the employees of the said commission who are not officers or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government such compensation as may be fixed by the President—or "by the commission." Perhaps the commission might fix the pay of the minor officers. However, I suggest that it be left where it is, so that the President will fix it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator from Iowa having this bill in charge made a very proper suggestion a moment ago, and I am sorry he did not adhere to it, namely, that the compensation of all the subordinate officials should be fixed by the commission rather than that the fixing of their compensation should be imposed upon the President. It seems to me they would know a great deal more about what the compensation ought to be, and that the President ought to be relieved from a matter of that kind.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not like to take the responsibility of so changing the bill without the suggestion of the committee. However, I am indifferent. I think perhaps the commission would do quite as well without burdening the President.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes; the Senator had the expression a moment ago, or I would formally offer an amendment. I move that the bill be amended as suggested by the Senator a moment ago, so as to put that duty upon the commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it read "as may be fixed by said commission."

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Strike out "President" and insert "said commission."

Mr. ALLISON. I will make that amendment, or accept it if it is offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to. Will the Secretary please state it, so that there may be no mistake?

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be read as amended.

The SECRETARY. In line 2, page 4, strike out the word "President" and insert "said commission;" so that the clause will read:

As may be fixed by the said commission.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. The proviso has not been acted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No. It has not been acted upon.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the Senator will put that down to $10.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask that the bill may be read, beginning with line 12, on page 1.

The Secretary read as follows:

And for the compensation of the members of said commission who are not officers in the civil or military service of the Government, $4,000 each, and for the employees of the said commission who are not officers or clerks in the civil or military service of the Government such compensation as may be fixed by the said commission.

Mr. COCKRELL. The proviso comes next.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the text down to the proviso. Now I ask that the proviso may be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the members of said commission shall be allowed the sum of $15 per day each, the assistant recorders $10 per day each, and the other employees of the commission in the service of the Government $6 per day each, while employed in the work of the commission, in lieu of traveling and all other expenses.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten."

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Secretary to reread the last clause of that proviso.

The Secretary again read the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Missouri moves to amend by striking out, in line 10, "fifteen" and inserting "ten."

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COCKRELL. I made that motion, and I hope it will prevail, too. I wish the Senator from Iowa would accept the amendment, because I think it would be an outrage to pass a bill providing for any other amount. It is the highest amount ever paid for the expenses of any one in the Government service.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest, Mr. President, that the expenses ought to be commensurate with the salary. If you are going to give a man $4,000 for probably two months' work, he ought to be permitted to spend $15 a day. I think, myself, that $4,000 is an outrageous allowance.

Mr. BERRY. So do I.

Mr. ALLISON. The observation of my friend the Senator from Texas persuades me to leave this question to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FORAKER. Is the proviso, since the amendment has been adopted, in form so that it can go into the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An amendment has just been agreed to, on motion of the Senator from Missouri, striking out "fifteen" and inserting "ten." The rest of the proviso stands.

Mr. FORAKER. The rest of it stands, but there is a repetition. Now, as it stands the allowance per day for expenses would be the same to the commissioners as to all the others——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be the same to the assistant recorders.

Mr. FORAKER. Except one class. I should think the proviso might be improved, now that the same allowance is to be made to the commissioners as to the recorders. Does not the Senator from Iowa want to change the proviso?

Mr. ALLISON. I think it would perhaps be a little better not to separate the assistant recorders.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not to separate the men who are officials.

Mr. ALLISON. But if the proviso can again be read I will perhaps suggest a modification.

Mr. FORAKER. It should read:

Provided, That the members of said commission and the assistant recorders shall be allowed the sum of $10 per day each.

The Secretary read as follows:

Provided, That the members of said commission shall be allowed the sum of $10 per day each and the assistant recorders $10 per day.

Mr. ALLISON. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It will then read:

Provided, That the members of said commission and the assistant recorders shall be allowed the sum of $10 per day each.

Mr. ALLISON. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. DANIEL. I desire to offer an amendment to come in after line 18, on page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

It is hereby further provided that no officer or employee of the United States, and no Senator or Member of the House of Representatives shall be assignable to service in any commission or office, or shall have any duties imposed upon him other than those imposed by law.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, I do not view or consider the action of the President in reference to the coal strike and the appointment of a commission in any spirit of criticism whatsoever. I believe it is the general sentiment of this country—it is certainly my own—that the President acted with great wisdom and discretion, and instead of criticising him I commend him for the good sense and patriotism which no doubt dictated his conduct.

Without intending to be at all critical, I would, however, make the remark that I regretted that any officer of the United States was included among those selected by him to consider this matter. I believe that when a citizen of the United States is elected by the people or by the general assembly or the legislative body of a State or is appointed under executive authority to fill any particular function whose duties are defined by the nature of our Government, its Constitution and laws, he should be dedicated solely to the discharge of those duties.

There is no office under this Government and there is no representative relation to this Government that has not imposed upon it duties and responsibilities great enough to absorb all the intellect and all the energies that any one man can bring to their fulfillment.

Apart from that fact there is an abundance of intellect, of character, of learning, and of wisdom among the people of this country, outside of those who hold any kind of position or official relation to the Government, to fill every office that exists or which may be created. Indeed, such is the genius and such the character of our people that there is an embarrassment of riches in the offerings or in the possibilities of places which it is utterly beyond the power of appointment to reach or even but partially to consider. I do not blame the President or apply any term of reproach to him because he selected officials. It is a good-natured habit that has grown upon all Administrations. Its promptings have in themselves been, as a rule, and for aught I know, altogether pure and just. Nevertheless, it seems to me to be a bad practice, and it ought to be forbidden by law.

The executive authority should know, and all of those who are in the employments to which they have been appointed should at the same time know, that they are dedicated to the discharge of those duties which the law has imposed upon them. I have therefore offered an amendment to the pending bill to declare by law that no civil, military, or naval officer of the United States and no employee of the United States shall be assignable to other duties than those which the law has imposed and put upon him.

It may be that in cases the compensation is small. The greater officers and functionaries of our Government do not get large compensation. At the same time, Mr. President, they hold positions of honor, and the time has not arrived in our Government—I trust it may never arrive—when honor will not be considered in itself a great reward for those who desire and those who seek it. And those who seek great honor and accept it must be content with that portion which has been allotted to them by their own seeking and by their own consent.

I hope, Mr. President, that this amendment will be adopted. It may be said that it might more appropriately come in a statute independent to itself. Such matters, Mr. President, are difficult of passage, and it is timely and apropos in connection with this matter. This is a case in which there is a judge of a great court, in which there is a general officer of the Army, in which there is a head of a bureau, and one other officer I know, who have been taken away from the bench, from the bureau, and have had duties imposed upon them which are totally disconnected with their professional lives. Those of them who have active duties to perform can not perform them while this responsibility is with them, and they ought not to have brought to them the condition where they may say "noblesse oblige"—"I am obliged to accept this place because of the importance of the position. The dignity of the appointment and the importance of the work are such that I feel called upon to accept."

There is not much remuneration in such places as these for gentlemen of the character and position of those who are naturally called to fill them, but it is a diversion from that which they have made their life's work and which the Government and the people have alike put upon them to do.

Judges of the Supreme Court have been translated to foreign nations. Senators upon this floor, where there can be at no time more than two representatives of a State, have had such calls made upon them and have been translated afar from the Government. I am not speaking words of reproach for them, nor do I intend to deliver criticism in any direction, except upon the practice, which is in itself not to be commended, but, on the contrary, ought to be deprecated and forbidden by law.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I think it is appropriate to put in this statute that plain and distinct provision; and I do it out of a mind that is not bent in any degree upon criticism of the Administration for that which in the main was an honorable, a just, and, in my judgment, a wise act on the part of the President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I should like to have it read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will again be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill the following:

It is hereby further provided that no officer or employee of the United States and no Senator or Member of the House of Representatives shall be assignable to service in any commission or office or shall have any duties imposed upon him other than those imposed by law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not now know how other Senators may feel about the matter, but I shall vote against this amendment. I do not think it is germane to this proposition, in the first place. In the second place, I do not think it is a wise proposition. If I may be permitted to express my opinion, I think the President's selection of Judge Gray was the most appropriate that could have been made; it was almost a necessary one to make. While it is true, I believe, that judges are not included in the amendment——

Mr. DANIEL. Yes; they are.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Are they? I understand, then, that in case a precisely similar crisis and emergency should arise hereafter it might be impossible to meet that crisis and emergency except by doing just what the President did—appointing a judge of the standing and character of Judge Gray, in whom everybody connected with the controversy had confidence.

Now, Mr. President, I believe it would be a very unwise matter so to tie the hands of the President of the United States that in a great emergency, arising where a Senator or a judge was admitted to be the one man who could be selected to perform the most efficient service for the United States he could not be appointed.

I agree that it is a practice which ought not to be enlarged, but I am not willing to say that in no condition which may arise in this country hereafter, in no great question which may arise for settlement, the one man who in the judgment not only of the President, but of all the people of the United States, is most fitted to meet that crisis and to compose that difficulty can not be appointed because he happens to be a member of the Senate or House of Representatives.

I do not wish to recur to the past. I would not wish to put it out of the power of the President of the United States, if a great question arose like that which resulted in sending the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] to Paris, that it could not be done. I believe when Senators come to think of it they will see that in the future of this country it is quite likely that circumstances will arise which will make it not only justifiable and proper, but almost essential and necessary, that some person, a member of the Senate or a member of the House of Representatives, or a judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, or a judge of some district or circuit court, shall be appointed to bring, by reason of his peculiar characteristics and ability, the best possible result out of those circumstances.

I do not know how the Senate may feel about it, but I wish to vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. TILLMAN. We had just as well have the yeas and nays on it.

Mr. ALLISON. I hope the Senator from South Carolina will not insist on calling for the yeas and nays. He will have ample opportunity to test the sense of the Senate on this question.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; we shall not have an opportunity to test the sense of the Senate on this peculiar proposition, because it is not likely that we are going to have any independent bill, and as we are dealing with the appointment by the President of men already occupying high official position who have duties to perform, and under this appointment they neglect them, I think we can establish the principle which the Senator from Virginia contended for so cogently—that it is unwise. If we simply put a mark against such things in the future, there are plenty of our citizens of ability, as the Senator has shown and as we all know, who are able to fill the places on all commissions.

Mr. BERRY. And are willing.

Mr. TILLMAN. And are willing and anxious. I really do not see why we could not, as a lawmaking body, now say that we think that it is unwise and improper. I should like to have the yeas and nays on the amendment if I can get a second.

Mr. DANIEL. I second it.

Mr. ALLISON. In a general way I am in sympathy with the proposition of the Senator from Virginia. Perhaps the rule ought to be observed that members of either House or persons holding high judicial office shall not be selected to serve on commissions. But the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] has very well stated that exceptional cases may arise. Now, this is an exceptional case, and I do not want to impliedly censure either the President or Judge Gray, who holds the high position which he occupies, by saying that he ought not to have been appointed on this commission and by giving other Senators an opportunity of saying that he is not doing a wise thing by staying upon the commission, because that will be the implication. I think the controversy has now assumed such a character that it is absolutely essential to the conclusion of the business that every gentleman who has accepted a place on the commission shall continue to serve on it until the matter is concluded.

I do not think the proposition is germane to the pending bill, and if it is to be considered it ought to be considered on fuller debate and with such modifications and changes as debate will disclose ought to be made. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his amendment. I did not suppose, as I listened to the viva voce taken, that it was generally regarded as a proper amendment to be put upon this bill, and I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw it. I think as a separate and independent measure I should vote for it, with some modification.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, if we could ever reach a time or a condition in which such legislation as this could be proposed without some condition antagonistic existing—in other words, if we could get around appearing to slap the President or to criticise his action, I would be willing to let the matter go.

Of course I understand that the amendment will be voted down; but Senators will remember that when three members of this body—its most distinguished members, members of the highest character and competence and all that kind of thing—were appointed on the Paris Peace Commission, this same question came up, and a resolution or a bill or an amendment of some kind was presented in this body by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], if I recollect correctly, and I think possibly voted on. But it must have failed to become a law, and it seems that we will continue to have Presidents go into official positions and take men to occupy places on these commissions, which are growing in number every year, and the fact that the Senate then failed to take any action and the fact that the Senate now will fail to take any action is notice to the Executive that he may continue to detail judges, to detail generals, to detail this, that, and the other officer to perform duties entirely foreign to his official position, and necessarily causing the neglect of his official duties.

I say that condition is one which is unhealthy, and I do not see why we could not act right now and here—without any criticism of the President, because everybody recognizes the importance and apparent necessity of his action and no one is disposed to find any fault with it so far as I see, but we could in as kind a way as possible—if we can do it kindly at all—let him understand that men can not be detailed out of their official positions to fill places on commissions when, as has been pointed out, there are so many people who are fully competent who are not in official life and who would be glad to get the place for the prominence it gives them. I do not say that Judge Gray, whom I admire and respect, because we were here together in friendly association for several years, was the only man in this part of the world who could have gone on this commission, and who had the absolute confidence of every man in the United States.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He knows Judge Gray? He knew him as Senator Gray?

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. He knows of his high character, and how sensitive he is, and properly so. What does he think Judge Gray would do if we should adopt this amendment here? What does he think he might do? How would the Senator himself feel if he were upon the commission and the Senate of the United States should pass such an amendment? Would he not feel that he really ought to withdraw from the Commission?

Mr. TILLMAN. Surely——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Well——

Mr. TILLMAN. Hold on now.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will not Judge Gray feel so?

Mr. TILLMAN. But Judge Gray is not responsible for being on the commission, except that possibly he made a mistake in accepting the place.

The question with us is whether or not it is wise and proper for this Government to grow into the habit of having the Executive take men who are in high official life and detail them out of their sphere, away from their recognized duties, and put them at work with which they have no other concern than that which obtains from the appointment. Are the regular judicial duties of Judge Gray going to be performed by somebody else, or will they be neglected?

Now, that is the situation, and we should consider whether we have an autocratic feeling growing among us as a people, or, rather, whether we are recognizing the existence of an autocracy which ignores what some of us regard as propriety. Of course, everybody here will have his own opinion as to the propriety or impropriety of this thing. Judge Gray's peculiar personal fitness may have suggested him, and the question of his judicial position and duties may not have occurred to the President.

I would, if it were possible, expressly declare that no criticism of the President's action is intended. I do not see how we could adopt the amendment without some implied objection to the practice. But after this bill has gone through will we have any Senators on the other side who will bring in an independent statute on its own merits which will deal with the question of taking officials from their places and putting them to other work extraneous and outside of their regular duties? No; we have no idea that such a thing will come. And so it will go on; this precedent and the one in regard to the appointment of our colleagues here on the Paris Commission, etc., will continue, and we shall have this practice to grow indefinitely.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] will not press this proposition as an amendment to the pending bill. I have, I am frank to say, very much sympathy with his reasons and his position, on general principles, although from the foundation of the Government it has been the practice to appoint Senators and others in official life to the discharge of duties outside of the particular sphere to which they have been assigned by the people, the President not even excluding judges.

I expressed here once my willingness to vote for a bill which would regulate this matter. There have been no commissions like this, if I understand it, and my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] is mistaken if he supposes that this so-called commission falls within the category of the "commissions provided for so often by Congress."

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator had been in the Chamber this morning he would have had considerable more light in regard to it.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps, and perhaps not.

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, I do not know that he would have received any light from so humble a source as I——

Mr. SPOONER. I do not presume that the Senator knows——

Mr. TILLMAN. But he would have had some knowledge of what has been under discussion here rather extensively to-day, and would at least be discussing this particular phase of the question with more intelligence.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, perhaps if the Senator had waited until I had stated my position he would be in a better position to pass intelligently upon my intelligence. I regret I was not in my seat this forenoon to have heard the Senator from South Carolina. This particular designation, or these designations, if I may use the plural, were made, as has been said here, in an exigency. I do not know of any law under which the President intervened in the matter. This is not a commission authorized by law.

Mr. TILLMAN. We all recognize that.

Mr. SPOONER. In any ordinary matter the President, of course, would not have intervened. Here was a menace to the whole country, involving not simply money losses, not simply a possible paralysis of commerce and of the industries of the country, but involving loss of life, hardship, and suffering throughout the whole country and among all classes of our people.

The President, in his statement to the parties to the controversy when they came before him on his invitation, informed them accurately that he had no authority to speak from the standpoint of either side—the operators, on the one hand, or the miners, on the other—but calling their attention to the existence of a third party vitally interested——

Mr. MORGAN. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that the President, as I understood it at the time, distinctly announced that he had no official connection with the controversy.

Mr. SPOONER. I have so stated.

Mr. MORGAN. None whatever.

Mr. SPOONER. I have so stated.

Mr. TILLMAN. And, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Allow me to finish my sentence. The President, stating that he acted in the interest of the people who were not only vitally interested in it, but with the approach of the winter were awfully menaced by it, brought the matter to their attention, and his courage in that respect, with the public sentiment of 80,000,000 people behind him, brought acquiescence. These men never could have agreed, undoubtedly, upon arbitrators, but they were willing under the circumstances to submit the controversy within limits to gentlemen named by the distinguished gentleman who is President.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. An arbitration.

Mr. SPOONER. An arbitration only.

Mr. TILLMAN. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Congress creates commissions. It was the mere designation of these gentlemen as arbitrators or rather an invitation to act, for they could not be detailed. The President had no more power to set a judge or any other public officer at this work by detail than he had to detail the Senator from South Carolina or myself to it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. In a moment. But he invited these gentlemen, who were agreeable entirely in this emergency to the parties to the controversy, to hear the statements and the evidence and the arguments and report their conclusion as to what was fair between them; and by that they agreed to abide, and dissipated the blackest cloud of that sort, Mr. President, which has hung over this people since I have lived.

Mr. TILLMAN. I hope the Senator will let me get in some time.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator had been present this morning——

Mr. SPOONER. I was not.

Mr. TILLMAN. And therefore you have been defending the President here where every one of us has acknowledged that the conditions were of a character to warrant his action. We have commended him, and we are only discussing the action of Congress in coming forward now and by a legal statute setting a precedent which will return to pester us.

Mr. SPOONER. No, Mr. President, my friend is mistaken; I am not defending the President, because the President needs nowhere in the United States—North or South, East or West, here or anywhere else—any defense for what he did. I am simply endeavoring to show that this is not a bill in connection with which we should regulate the appointment by the President of public officials to commissions created by Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Now, if the Senator will permit me, I wish to get through. I will be through in a minute.

Mr. TILLMAN. But the Senator is unfair to me.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield, then, if the Senator thinks that.

Mr. TILLMAN. The point I wish to ask the Senator to illuminate is how it is that a high officer of the Army accepts an invitation from the President to neglect his official duties and go about something else, and how does another head of a bureau accept an invitation from the President to neglect his official duties and go about another matter? If they are not detailed in actuality, they are detailed in essence, and the Senator need not quibble.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, that word is not courteous.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not want any controversy with the Senator from Wisconsin, whom I almost love, and all that kind of thing [laughter]; but he goes about the thing, you know, in such an unfair way sometimes, and jumps to conclusions, that I naturally resent the soft imputations which he casts on me.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator through?

Mr. TILLMAN. Oh, for the present. I do not know; you may stir me up again. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. I am not going to make the Senator quit talking. I know the Senator too well to make such a large application of my question.

Now, the Army officer who is on this arbitration commission—I say it is not——

Mr. TILLMAN. I only take the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care about that. I am trying to get at the facts. You may call it a commission. General Wilson is the Army officer to whom the Senator referred. He is on the retired list. He is not absent from any duty whatever. He accepted an invitation from the President, being agreeable to the parties and a fit man to act as an arbitrator in this emergency, in which the public was so largely interested. Judge Gray was invited. He was at perfect liberty technically to decline, but, Mr. President, being agreeable to the parties to this controversy and keeping in mind the nature of the controversy and its relation to the people of the United States, I doubt if he was at liberty morally to decline.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Of course.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator quit discussing the personal phase of this proposition and bringing in the personality of the various members of the commission, on whom we are all agreed and whom we respect and whose opinion we will attach great weight to? Will he just leave all that out and come to the plain, concrete proposition as to whether it was right and proper and a good practice to have inaugurated and continued and broadened and deepened to have the President appoint men who are already filling official places and have official duties to go about something else?

Now, that is the whole thing involved in this amendment, and there is nothing else to it; and the personality of Judge Gray or of any member of the commission, or any reflection on the President's course, or anything connected with the strike is not really at issue. It is merely the settlement once for all of the proposition that we as a part of the legislative body of this country think that there are enough other citizens outside of the official world who can do all this kind of work without detailing or inviting or employing officials.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina astonishes me. He always astonishes me when he makes so obvious a mistake as he has just made. I have uttered no word about the characteristics or the qualities or the reputation of any man designated by the President to act as an arbitrator in this matter. All I have said as to General Wilson was, in reply to the Senator from South Carolina, that he was a retired officer, and therefore not neglecting any public duties by accepting and discharging the duty as an arbitrator.

I was saying that Judge Gray, or almost any other man, I think, invited by the President of the United States in such an exigency, and found to be agreeable to the parties to the controversy, could hardly have felt himself at liberty to decline. It is not a new thing for judges to act as arbitrators; it has not been considered unjudicial. It may, perhaps, be subject to the narrow criticism that for the moment, or the day, or the week the judge is absent from the bench or absent from his chambers, but in this case the function is one that is judicial, essentially so.

I remember one case in which Justice Miller of the Supreme Court of the United States acted as an arbitrator, and made his award by the common consent of the parties. These men were not appointed by the President in the sense in which we use the word in laws or in which it is used in the Constitution. Here the parties agreed to submit their controversy to arbitrators, who should be chosen by Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States. If we create a commission the President may appoint men to that commission.

I would vote with qualifications for this proposition as applied to such a commission; but this is no case of that kind. This amendment is simply a proposition that hereafter, should a case of this kind arise and the President in an exigency be put where he must find men who will act as arbitrators, who can act agreeably to the wishes of both parties to a great controversy affecting the public, he shall not appoint a Federal judge or any other man in public position under the United States. I do not favor it.

It seems to me—I may be wrong about it—that we ought not while Judge Gray is discharging this really self-imposed function—he was not detailed or appointed, he was invited—as an arbitrator in this very important matter to pass as an amendment to this bill a Congressional declaration that he has no business to be discharging that duty or that there is impropriety in it.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that until this bill becomes a law the gentlemen who are arbitrating this question have no official character. The coal operators and the operatives simply agreed to submit the issues between them to a number of arbitrators named by the President of the United States. They might have agreed with equal propriety and equal safety to have submitted those issues to arbitrators named by the bishop of some church, or any other man whose character and standing assured an impartial selection of arbitrators. In that view of the matter this amendment would not really restrain the President, because he simply names men, not officially, but really unofficially designates them.

I rose to suggest—not to the Senator from Wisconsin, but to the chairman of the committee—that it would be an excellent idea to conform this bill to these facts, and to describe these gentlemen as arbitrators rather than as commissioners, because the law creates commissions, and commissioners are generally officials. I should much prefer, indeed, that they should be properly described as mere arbitrators selected by a disinterested person without regard to his office to perform a great service in allaying excitement and relieving distress that would have come out of a prolonged strike; and I should be willing to see the expenses paid out of the public Treasury, but I will not vote for a proposition to recognize the right of the President to create a quasi-official body without authority of law.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, Mr. President, I will say to my friend from Texas that before I rose I had expressed to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] the same view which the Senator from Texas now does. In view of the fact that this is a unique case, one which we all hope will not occur again in the country, there being no action of Congress behind it, I hope the Senator from Virginia will put his proposition in the form of a bill, such a one as the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] introduced at a former session of Congress, which I was for, and not press it as to this particular appropriation to which it has not relevancy.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am very thoroughly in sympathy with the purpose of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], and would certainly support a bill which would enact into a law that which he seeks to accomplish. I agree, however, with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and with the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], that there may be reasons why the amendment is not entirely appropriate on this particular occasion.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, that this is not properly a commission; it is not the kind of commission to service upon which officials have heretofore been detailed; it is not a commission which has any powers; it is not a commission which can make any award which can be enforced in law. It is a purely voluntary body of men, selected by one who did not claim any legal authority to constitute it, and to the decision of which the parties have voluntarily consented they will submit. That is all there is in it.

So far as the creation of a commission which shall be clothed with legal power is concerned, I think there can be no principle which is rested upon a more solid foundation than that which would deny to the President the right to detail officials of the Government for service upon such a commission. Although, as stated in this debate, from the very earliest history of the Government that has been the practice, I have always thought it was a bad practice, a vicious practice, and to the extent of the opportunities which I have had I have endeavored to give my influence against it.

Something has been said here about a bill or resolution—I have forgotten which it was—in reference to this subject which was introduced by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. That was immediately after the return of the Spanish Treaty Commission, and was in substance the same as the amendment which is now offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL].

That was referred to the Judiciary Committee, of which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], was then a member; and without betraying any secrets, or disclosing improperly what occurred in that committee, I desire to say, and I think I can do so with propriety, that a large majority of that committee favored what was sought to be accomplished by that bill or resolution; but no action was ever taken in the Senate, because the committee thought it was better to give a direction, which, while it would accomplish the purpose, would not have the effect of seeming to make any implied censure either upon the President or upon those who have served upon any of the commissions which had been within the recent past created. I know the conclusion was reached by the committee that there would be in the future no such appointments made, and there have been none since. I do not regard the appointment of this Anthracite Coal Strike Commission as a violation of the principle which was sought to be accomplished by the Hoar amendment.

Mr. President, I think there is a great deal in the suggestion made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] as to the personal application in this particular case which will be made of the action taken by the Senate if this amendment should be adopted. I will state a fact, which will doubtless be recalled by all Senators, and that is, not simply that Judge Gray was invited—and I think that term is proper, for it was simply an invitation—not only was he invited, but the coal miners in their proposition—because the proposition for arbitration originated with them—suggested that they desired that there should be upon the commission one of the judges of the Federal court of this particular circuit or of some adjoining circuit. Am I correct in that? I am quite sure I am.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say that it was either the coal miners or the coal operators.

Mr. BACON. It was the coal miners.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. It was part of the proposition that a judge of the circuit court of Pennsylvania, or a member of the supreme bench of the State of Pennsylvania, should be selected.

Mr. BACON. Yes. The proposition did not originate with the President of the United States. It originated with the coal miners. Of course they were deeply interested in having not only impartial men, but able men to pass upon questions so vital to them, and when the question was up whether or not there should be such a commission appointed, or board of arbitrators, if that term is preferred, the stipulation was made by the coal miners that one of this board of arbitrators should be a judge of the Federal court within certain districts or circuits.

I repeat, sir, that so far as concerns the creation of a commission which is clothed with the power to arbitrate under a law, or to carry a decision into execution, or to negotiate a treaty, I most heartily agree with the proposition contained in the amendment—that the President ought not to be permitted to appoint any official of any department of the Government to the performance of such a duty; but this so-called commission was an entirely different thing, and I think there is great point in the suggestion that at this particular time for us to adopt this amendment would necessarily be construed by Judge Gray into the expression of an opinion by the Senate that there was an impropriety in his appointment and an impropriety in his serving; whereas I do not think there is either. I would think so if it were properly a commission, but I do not so regard this board.

In his opposition to this amendment the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] went much further than I would go. I entirely agree with the view suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, that this is not a commission clothed with any power, but that it is a body of men selected with a view to their intervening to avert what all considered to have been a great impending calamity; clothed with no power to make any award, except so far as it might be consented to by the parties; with no power to enforce it; and all we do in the way of compensation is to do that which I think we are morally and properly bound to do, but not legally bound to do; and my position is based on this view. But in discussing this question the Senator from Connecticut went a great deal further than I do, because he attacked the general proposition contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL]; and I think, if I recollect aright, the views now presented by the Senator were the same as those expressed by him at the time the Hoar resolution or bill was before the Senate.

I do not agree that there can be any emergency where it is of such importance that an official either of the executive, judicial, or legislative department shall be subject to be detailed by the President of the United States to other duties than those which are imposed upon him by law. I thought at the time of the remark of the Senator that in case we should have in the near future some complications with reference to Cuba it would make it very importent that the Senator from Connecticut, who has been the chairman of the Committee on Relations with Cuba, should be connected with it, and I recognize that; but that can be accomplished through his representation of this Senate as a committeeman as thoroughly as it can be by his representation of the executive department as a commissioner.

Mr. President, we all know Judge Gray. Many of us served with him in this Chamber. There is no man more sensitive than he to any suggestion of impropriety. I think he is now in a position where he should not be embarrassed by any such suggestion. I think it is important that the present board should proceed with their work if there is any further work remaining for them to do, and while I am thoroughly in accord with the proposition as to the impropriety of the detailing of officials of the Government by the President to serve upon commissions, I think this is an occasion, Mr. President, which ought not to be availed of for the purpose of giving expression to that view.

I hope with the Senator from Wisconsin that we may not be called upon at this time to vote upon this proposition. I said early in the day, Mr. President, that I hoped upon this occasion we might vote upon this question without division; and before the Senator from Wisconsin came in, when that part of the debate was progressing, the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from Maine, and other Senators in charge of the bill on that side of the Chamber reciprocated that wish, and they had conceded various points in order that upon the consideration of this most important measure, growing out of this unusual and unique condition of affairs, the Senate might present an unbroken front and not be divided upon the main question or upon any of the details. Of course, I fully appreciate the sentiment and the wish which has animated the Senator from Virginia, and I am thoroughly in accord with what he desires to accomplish. I do think, however, that this is not the proper time to do it.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, in the remarks which I made upon the offering of this amendment there was nothing which, by the most attenuated construction, could be supposed to contain a criticism either upon the President's action or the action of anyone else. So far as the President was concerned, his main action in the premises has met with the almost unanimous approbation of the American people, and his conduct, dignified, decided, and prompt in the face of an emergency which made the whole people feel exceedingly anxious, was, in my judgment, very commendable.

Most of the gentlemen who have spoken against the amendment have declared that in their own judgment it contains a correct principle. So far as their minds are concerned they admit the justice, the propriety, and the expediency of the doctrine which I commend. That is much greater censure than the act itself contains, for it implies that the putting of their principle into law is a criticism which the maintaining of the opinion does not carry. I can not make so fine a discrimination. I did not intend, nor do I now intend, either in expression of opinion or by declaration of law, to put a censure upon anyone connected with that matter.

Concatenations of circumstances come up in which one man is set in motion by a great and good motion, and where another is so connected with it that he is drawn into it by this influence or that, and finally, as a resultant, something is done which as a permanent system we would not be willing to welcome and to establish. So far as the President is concerned, and so far as is concerned any member of the board of arbitration or so-called commission, we are here and now called upon to deliver a vote of affirmative confidence and compliment. Wherein does this act involve the vote of confidence and compliment in embodying into law that which was not law and will not become law until Congress has enacted it as law and the President has approved it?

From the moment that that act becomes a law, the so-called inchoate, tentative arbitration or commission becomes an establishment of the Government of the United States, paid out of its Treasury, and, in effect, commissioned to perform duties for the whole people of the United States under compensation from them. So the word "commission" is used in this act, because when the act is passed the commission has arrived, is then created, and becomes a salaried commission of the United States; and knowing those whom the President has previously selected as members of that arbitration or commission, they will be themselves, per force of law, the recipients of the vote of confidence of Congress by being made salaried employees of the United States of America and a compensation provided for them.

It is very well for a public officer or a public agent to be sensitive about his public relation, but there is no reason in being supersensitive; there is no justification or ground for hunting around to see whether or not the persons who are confirming you and who are voting to pay you intended by some reflex, back action, to censure you for doing the thing which they propose to compliment and pay you for, because they reach into the future and say, "For the future we think another system of reaching employees is a wiser and better one."

The gentleman who is so supersensitive and who flinches so quickly when he is neither struck nor struck at, if he will go hunting through the world can find something to be sensitive about all the time; but no just ground of sensitiveness is contained in this declaration. If the honorable and intelligent gentlemen who have spoken in applause of the principle had felt that that principle was in itself a censure upon these gentlemen, they would never have uttered those words upon the Senate floor. It was the fact that they realized that that principle is no censure of any man here or there that caused them to get up and speak in its behalf; but they say somebody somewhere will make this construction and this imputation, and have this fancy or that. We are not responsible, Mr. President, for the foolish fancies of the world. We can not measure the sensitiveness of mankind and regulate our conduct here by that. If we know that we are right, all sensitiveness will settle itself in a perfectly satisfactory way.

The Senator from Wisconsin says that it is a declaration of Congress that these gentleman ought not to be in that business. On the contrary, it is a declaration of Congress to put them into that business and pay them for discharging it in the future as salaried employees of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, does it not also prohibit it ever being done again?

Mr. DANIEL. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. On what theory?

Mr. DANIEL. Because a thing may be all right when it is forbidden.

Mr. SPOONER. Upon the theory that it is not proper that it should be done?

Mr. DANIEL. Because it is wiser and best as a system of government to look elsewhere; and the Senator says that himself. Is he reflecting upon these gentlemen for having done in the past that which he does not propose to have anybody do in the future? If he does not want it done in the future, why not say so, not by mere word of mouth, but say it and seal it? The reflection is as great by the word as by the deed, but if the word is right the deed is also right.

On the other hand, there rises the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. He is not in accord with the distinguished Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] or the distinguished Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. He thinks it is a wise and good system. He desires that the President of the United States may look into the halls of Congress, among the representatives of the States and the people and among the public officers of the United States and may put them in this inchoate way upon commissions. He thinks the time is coming in this country, different from the past, in which it will be better to mix things up in that sort of fashion.

I respectfully dissent from the Senator from Connecticut. I realize, Mr. President, that this practice is not a new one. The President of the United States who now holds that high and responsible position did not originate it. During Mr. Cleveland's Administration when he appointed a commissioner to Hawaii, although he was not an officer of the United States, I stood on this side of the Chamber and heard invective and diatribe upon the other against his power. I supported him in it. He had precedents back to the days of George Washington. It had been the fashion of our Government, and it will be even if this provision which I have had the honor to propose shall become a law, because we all realize that such things are purely tentative, that emergencies happen which no law can anticipate and no human wisdom provide for.

And in those cases where the act done has been a wise and a just one, the President may always confide in the wisdom of Congress, without the slightest scintilla of party relation to it, to substantiate and make good his veritable and patriotic act done for the interest of the whole people. All we propose to say is what is in the minds of Senators here on both sides of the Chamber. Indeed, if I may judge from the speeches which have been made, the most of them will vote against it because they are in favor of it.

Now, Mr. President, we should be practical in our attempts at legislation. I disclaim personal reflection upon anyone. I have not risen to offer this amendment with any kind of feeling against anyone. I have simply sought to embody a just principle which the great majority of the honorable gentlemen who have spoken against it recognize and applaud, but say, "Do not do it now. We fear somebody will be supersensitive." I take it that the gentlemen who are on this commission are sensible and experienced men. I think, when they read in an act of Congress that Congress has indorsed the action of the President, and more than that has gone further and made them a commission, which the President could not do, and has paid them a salary out of the Treasury of the United States, they will see in the act of Congress a thing done which precludes the fancies of criticism or the fancies from which a just sensitiveness might arise.

Our opportunities for legislation arise in such a case as this. This amendment is germane to the pending bill. It provides against a misconstruction of it. It does not relate to the past, which it proposes to confirm and to decree into law. It provides for the future, for the preservation of all the departments of this Government in their just independence of each other, in concentrating every mind in the Government to the performance of those duties which are provided by law.

I know, Mr. President, that every party which has ever been in power in this country has made the same or a similar record. Some of the most distinguished Senators and Representatives who have honored the history of their country upon the floors of Congress have accepted such positions from executive authority and have made their names famous in the discharge of the duties which devolved upon them. I would put no blur upon their history; I would attribute no censure in a historical or a personal sense to anyone who was connected with such transactions; but because great and good men have been related to systems which the experience of time has shown us not to be the wisest, shall their names be evoked from the history of the past or brought up against us in the present to stop the wheels of a just measure of reform which gentlemen themselves say they desire to be perfected?

This, Mr. President, is making substance bow to form. It is making supersensitiveness and ceremony walk at the front when honest, practical legislation ought to have the right of way and go forward. I would be very glad indeed to accommodate the wishes of my distinguished and courteous friend the Senator from Wisconsin. If I saw the matter as he does, I would do so, because I do not think that this is an act or this an occasion in which, even if criticism or censure of any kind were proper, should be made the occasion for its utterance.

But not intending criticism or censure at this or at another time, I do not apprehend that the sentimentality which underlies that principle will be looked upon by any eye or be heard by any ear with any disposition to misunderstand or misconstrue it. I do not believe that the President himself would suppose that Congress or anyone in Congress intended thereby to imply a reflection upon him. In the main thing that he has done we are proud and glad to applaud him and in every way that is practicable to uphold his hands as the hands of a patriot and a statesman who was doing the wise and just thing for his country. And without disturbing that wise and just thing in any relation in which he chose to put it, we say, as to the future, "there is a rule which ought to be observed about such matters;" that is all.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I wish my honorable friend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL], for whose opinions on this as on all other subjects the entire Senate has such profound respect, would be willing to withdraw this amendment as a proposed amendment to the present bill and bring up the subject by itself in some appropriate bill, when the Senate may deal with it not only more deliberately, but having regard to some consideration which there is hardly time to urge now.

I make that appeal to him for two reasons. One is that I think he himself would like to limit—certainly I think many Senators who entirely agree with him in his general view, as I do very earnestly and heartily, would like to limit—the operation of this amendment as it is not now limited by its language. The amendment proposes that—

> No officer or employee of the United States * * * shall have any duties imposed upon him other than those imposed by law.

Now, I doubt whether my honorable friend himself would say, if we have to make a postal convention with some foreign country, that it would be well to exclude from the service of the country the best postmaster in the United States, the postmaster of one of our great cities, or anybody now in the public employ, who knows all about the subject, which is a difficult and technical subject.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to respond to him?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. DANIEL. I will say by no means, but, on the contrary, I would provide in the law by which the postal convention is attended by the United States that such persons might be put on.

Mr. HOAR. But these postal conventions are not always or frequently provided by law beforehand. There are I will not say a thousand arrangements, but a great many, that come up not through our ordinary diplomatic channels which can not be anticipated beforehand. Take a case like this. There are certainly a great many occasions when the President of the United States wants to summon to Washington somebody in the employ of the Government to take his advice, who is not compelled by law to come to Washington and advise him; and that is in essence and substance all that the President has done with this commission. He has asked them to go down and hear the parties and then give the parties and himself and also the country their account of the condition of things, with some recommendations.

It would be, in my judgment, a calamity to have the amendment of the Senator voted down, and I for one should be compelled to vote against it as it stands, because it would be taken hereafter, I am afraid, as a judgment of the Senate that what has happened in the past is approved or not disapproved by Congress. That is my other reason for hoping the Senator will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts give me an opportunity to surrender?

Mr. HOAR. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. DANIEL. When I was asked by several other gentlemen, for whose opinions and wishes I have great respect, to withdraw the amendment, I hoped that perhaps I might persist and get this matter through. But the Senator from Massachusetts has piled Ossa on Pelion, and I surrender to his request, so kindly made, and will seek a more fitting and more hopeful occasion. I might do the measure more harm than good by persisting now. For the present I give up.

Mr. HOAR. While I am up I should like to make one or two statements by way of history.

The President of the United States, on ten or a dozen occasions since I have been in public life, has nominated members of this body for important public services, either diplomatic or other, but generally diplomatic. In that he followed the precedent of Washington, who appointed John Jay, then Chief Justice of the United States, to make a treaty with Great Britain, perhaps the most famous single treaty in our annals. The first case which I remember was that of the monetary commission for the sake of dealing with the use of silver. There were two or three such commissions, in every one of which a member of the Senate was made a commissioner.

On the first occasion of that kind I made a very earnest protest against the inauguration of that practice, although the members of the Senate who were selected for that service were perhaps the very fittest men in the United States on either side. There was one commission, on the silver question, the bill for which did not go through, I think, on which, I believe, my honorable friend the Senator from Virginia was expected to be named. I do not mean that he had given his assent, but it was hoped by the country, I may say, at any rate, that he would be one of the commissioners.

Mr. DANIEL. I think that was one provided by law.

Mr. HOAR. Yes; one provided by law. But there have been others not provided by law. However, the objection in my mind does not——

Mr. DANIEL. Further, I beg leave to state to the Senator, it was not one of Executive appointment.

Mr. HOAR. No.

Mr. DANIEL. It was in the nature, if I remember correctly, of a delegation of the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. Perhaps with respect to that one it was so. But at any rate the question whether it is provided by law or is not is not decisive in my mind in regard to the matter of disapproving the practice. I do not think the President of the United States ought to take members from either House of Congress, whether by law or without, and impose upon them honorable and distinguished duties, for which they receive either a salary from the Government or compensation—sometimes pretty large—awarded by the President and an opportunity to go abroad and enjoy the great honor and pleasure of a visit and a residence at foreign capitals. It is a very conspicuous honor and a very conspicuous advantage and delight; and the President, who is prohibited by the Constitution from appointing a Senator or Representative to an office, ought not to come into this body and increase his Executive influence with Senators by the exercise of such a power.

In the next place, it puts the Senate in a most awkward situation. Here are members coming to this body responsible for a treaty, and then they are going to vote as Senators on the very treaty they themselves have negotiated under the absolute command or direction of the Executive. They are in no condition to listen to the arguments of their fellows, as the rest of us do. They are in no condition to consult with us as equals. Sometimes, I believe I have very good reason to say, Senators have voted as Senators on the floor for the ratification of treaties for which they never would have voted in the world except for their relation to the treaties as commissioners which they made under the direction of the President.

Mr. President, I do not think any blame or criticism is to be attached to the Senators who in recent years have accepted such employment. They acted upon a precedent established by General Washington and John Jay, and that is a pretty good precedent for anybody's action and a precedent which has been followed ever since. Although there was no vote of the body, yet I suppose from the time of the Jay treaty, which was the case of a judge, down to the Paris treaty, which was a case of Senators, the Senators who accepted commissions (and so in the case of the commission to Hawaii and others I could name) were the men whom all their associates would have delighted to have exercise those functions, as far as the individual was concerned and as far as the particular service was concerned. But when it comes to this practice, which has obtained so far, and we come to consider it as a matter of general principle, I think nearly every Senator who has acted under the old practice would say he thinks on the whole it would be better that it should not be continued.

I remember a very eminent member of the Judiciary Committee, not now in the Senate, who was at that time acting on a commission to make a treaty with Canada. He stated that he was himself entirely convinced that the practice had better be discontinued. If I mistake not, he voted in the Judiciary Committee for a bill or resolution which would have the effect of discontinuing it in the future, although he had himself acted upon this service.

Now, this matter came up in the Judiciary Committee at the last Congress but one, I think. I suppose I am not betraying any confidence when I say that the committee were unanimous, I believe, with possibly one exception, in disapproving the practice. But we all thought that we did not want at that time to report a measure or resolution which might be construed by persons who did not know the facts into some possible censure or disapproval of the course of our associates in the Senate. Therefore we all agreed that it was better to leave any legislation or resolution on that subject to a time when there was no practical question which would affect anybody, and when everybody could deal with it without any seeming discourtesy or any prejudice.

But I, as chairman, was directed by the committee to wait upon President McKinley and recite to him what had happened and to say that it was the hope of the committee that the practice would not be further extended or continued. I waited upon President McKinley and communicated to him what I had been directed to say. President McKinley told me that, on reflection, he himself was entirely of that opinion, and that he did not think it was a practice which ought to be maintained.

But he added, what I suppose there is no great impropriety in saying, that it was hardly conceivable what difficulty he found in getting precisely the proper instrumentalities for diplomatic service, and that if he were excluded by law or by custom from availing himself of the capacities of the Senators who were familiar with the great subjects to be dealt with diplomatically, who were to act afterwards under their responsibility as Senators, it would increase very much indeed his difficulties in cases like those which had come up; that very nearly always the fittest men in the United States to go and cope with and struggle with and contend with skilled diplomatists abroad were very likely to be found in the Senate, as had been found in the very distinguished case in which the President of the Senate himself was one of the commission.

So there was absolutely no feeling on anybody's part that anything had been done by any of our associates or by President McKinley which was not in pursuance of very important precedents and in consonance with a practice which had prevailed almost from the beginning.

Now, I hope that at some convenient time the Senate will pass a law or resolution expressive of the feeling which I believe prevails almost without exception in this body. There are two or three exceptions, I know, but in general I believe the opinion of the body is almost unanimous that it is not well to allow the President of the United States so to appoint Senators. It is either appointing a committee for the Senate on the subject, when the Senate has the right to appoint its own, or is establishing a peculiar relation of confidence and control and interest between the Executive and some Senators that does not extend to the whole body.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. President, I merely wish to make one remark, as it is getting late.

I remember the occasion when this matter was up in committee and was discussed. I was one of the few persons, perhaps, on that occasion not fully convinced, but acquiescing. This question has been discussed at both ends of the Capitol many, many times. It has seemed to me that excellent men, because apprehensive of a particular result or opposed to a particular matter on principle, find fault with the method; and I think if, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, this question is to be discussed, it had better arise upon a distinct proposition and there had better accompany it a list of the commissions which have been appointed by the Executives of this country from the days of Washington to McKinley.

Looking in the historic past and looking in the recent past if it be found that the commissions which have been appointed have been uniformly of the best selection and the work they have done has been the best work, then it may appear from the experience of a hundred and twenty-six years that the Executive, having the difficulty to which the Senator from Massachusetts referred, unless he did appoint a member of the judiciary or of either House of Congress, could not find some man with special fitness and aptitude for a delicate and important work, it would weaken the interest of the country and it would deprive the country of the services which were preeminently needed by the country to put this sort of a hamper upon the Executive discretion.

It has been said that in foreign mails you should have an expert. That is only one instance. In the foreign mail service you have for generations chosen employees exclusively from that service, because there are no other experts to be had. In respect to coinage, weights, and measures it has been the uniform custom in this country, and in respect of diplomatic subjects and many parliamentary questions. There is no other mode than to take from the ranks of the service, where the most experience resides, or those who have gained from their experience the most confidence of the people. Unless they can be taken the public suffers a loss.

Whenever this question shall come again before the Senate I hope that the gallant and wise Senator from Massachusetts, with the frankness and fairness so characteristic of him, may have compiled a list of all the commissions appointed from the days of Washington to the present. And if what we have done was well done and should not be undone, and if the men who have done it in the retrospect were the best men to do it, if there were among them men who could not have been equaled in performing that service, then why from this general notion of delicacy should the country lose substantial benefits?

Mr. HOAR. May I ask my honorable friend a question?

Mr. McCOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. What does the Senator understand about the reason which induced the framers of the Constitution to provide that the President of the United States could not appoint a Senator or Representative to any office whatever of trust or profit under the United States, not even a village post-office, which would be consistent with his sending that Senator to a foreign capital to do exactly what an ambassador would do, to receive $20,000 or $30,000 as salary for the service, and have him spend a season there with the highest social position for the time on the face of the earth? I suppose the purpose of that constitutional provision which prevents the President of the United States from offering me the local post-office in my town is that there shall not be any Executive influence over the Senate.

Mr. McCOMAS. My answer is that the provision of the Constitution was not intended to apply to this sort of a case, for had it been so George Washington would not have quit the chair as President of the Convention which framed the Constitution, and then as the first President violated the spirit and letter of the Constitution by sending John Jay as a commissioner to perform the service he did.

Mr. HOAR. I am speaking of a Senator. What was the reason why the Constitution prohibited the President from appointing a Senator to office?

Mr. McCOMAS. And in further answer, Mr. President, when the Presidents lived in the time of the fathers and appointed Senators on some commissions of that sort, I apprehend that the fathers did not expect in the Constitution which they had just approved such a nicety, such a delicacy, such a sensitiveness as is now exhibited in this latter day, long after those men who made the Constitution did not make this application of it to commissions.

I say that in common sense and in the interest of the country we should not too much refine upon this matter. If the best man be a judge, if the best man be a Senator, if the best man be a member of the House, then the country is entitled to have the best man to represent it in something of that sort. In this particular case here, as has been said, these men are a commission in the sense that they are a board of conciliation made up by the friends of both sides. And what more natural than that an able judge who had won their confidence should be accepted by both sides as the chief arbitrator on that commission? There may have been hundreds of men in the same locality who would have been quite as good, but here was a man as chairman of a board of conciliation whose record and experience convinced both sides that they should quit their warring at this time and agree to take that man as one of the commissioners.

Therefore I say I think the time should not too early come when we should legislate to deprive the country of that which the Executives, from the first to the last, have found of very great service, honor, and profit to our common country.

The hour is late——

Mr. HOAR. My friend does not answer my question. Will he allow me to read this provision of the Constitution?

No Senator or Representative—

This does not apply to justices at all; it is speaking of Senators and Representatives.

No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office.

Now, what was the reason for that provision?

Mr. McCOMAS. That would prevent a Senator or Representative from holding an office; and I have in vain expressed my impression if a place on the commission is an office. I insist that it is not an office.

Mr. HOAR. I so understand, but my question is not whether it is an office. My question is, What is the reason for this provision of the Constitution?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Chair a question, if the Senator from Maryland will allow me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. MCCOMAS. I yield for a moment.

Mr. SCOTT. Was not the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia withdrawn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Now, Mr. President, I merely answer that the members of the commission of which we are now talking are not, in the purview of the Constitution, what the Senator intimates; and the general and uniform practice of the Executives and the approval of the legislative body seem to maintain the construction for which I contend.

Mr. HOAR. My question is not whether they are officers or not; my question is, What was the reason for that constitutional provision? Will the Senator answer that?

Mr. MCCOMAS. The reason of the framers of the Constitution upon that proposition I am not prepared to discuss at this late hour. I only desire to say that the thing which we are now asked to do ought not to be done hastily or as of common consent. I am glad the amendment has been withdrawn, and if the Senator from West Virginia had been present he would have observed that a little while ago, but the withdrawal of the amendment with the suggestion of renewing the question induced me as one of the younger members of this body to say that I want to have the history of the operation of these commissions brought up for a discussion of the practice, whether it be good or bad.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BAILEY. I desire to know if it is still in order to offer an amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. BAILEY. I lost my opportunity to offer it because I thought it was understood that the word "Commission" where it appears here should be stricken out and in its place either "Arbitration" or "Board of Arbitrators" should be adopted. Words are sometimes unimportant and sometimes when they are intended to describe things they are very important. This is not a commission. This is a board of arbitration, and as such the President was entirely justified in appointing it. If he had attempted to appoint a commission without the authority of law I should not ratify that appointment; and I do not intend with those words in the bill to vote for it.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Texas suggested this change to me. I saw no especial objection to it, and I do not now, except that I am afraid if the words are changed this appropriation will not be available, and as I do not know what the designation is of the gentlemen who are now acting.

Mr. BAILEY. There can be no designation. There is no law under which they could have been designated.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose they are designated as a commission.

Mr. BAILEY. When and how? There can be no official designation of them until this bill passes. Now the bill simply recognizes the propriety of the appointment of arbitrators, a voluntary operation entirely, and the only extent to which the bill commits Congress is that we are willing to pay the expenses of an arbitration.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I suggest that, following "Commission," the words "of Arbitrators" would be within any designation I have ever seen. It is true, as the Senator from Texas says, that we are now for the first time fixing a legal name. If he does not object to that amendment it seems to me that it ought to be made.

Mr. ALLISON. By unanimous consent it can be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By unanimous consent, of course, the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time can be reconsidered. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading and read the third time?

Mr. MASON. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. BAILEY. I would be glad to have the chairman of the committee make a motion to reconsider. If he does not I shall move it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to reconsidering the vote and inserting those words. I hope the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

Mr. MASON. I withdraw the objection. I made the objection, Mr. President, because I can not see any difference. We make it whatever we make it. It has no power necessarily until we give it power, retroactive in a way. Whether we call it a rose or anything else it can not make any difference.

Mr. BAILEY. It is said—

> That which we call a rose
> By any other name would smell as sweet.

But all things are not roses, the Senator from Illinois will understand. When we deal with literature that kind of an expression is permissible, but when we deal with practical and industrial conditions it looks to me like it is desirable to call a thing exactly what it is. This is a board of arbitration, and it seems to me that when we come to——

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. What more power has the President to appoint a board of arbitration than he has to appoint a commission?

Mr. BAILEY. The President has no more authority to appoint it than I have or the Senator from Illinois. If these parties had come and said "we will agree to abide by the decision of a board of arbitrators named by the Senator from Illinois, Mr. MASON," under the circumstances the Senator from Illinois would have undoubtedly named the arbitrators; and when they were saving the country such a serious menace as then threatened its industrial and commercial peace I would have voted to pay the expenses of a board of arbitration appointed even by the Senator from Illinois. That is precisely what I want to do here.

Mr. MASON. I suppose I ought not to take further time than to say if we talk any longer we can not have any coal next week. So I will save my speech until next week.

Mr. ALLISON. Do I understand correctly that the vote has been reconsidered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Was the objection withdrawn?

Mr. MASON. It was withdrawn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection being withdrawn, the vote ordering the bill to a third reading is reconsidered and the bill is open to amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, in line 7, I move to strike out "Commission" and insert "Arbitration," and in line 8 the same.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest, in line 8, the word "arbitrators" would be better than "arbitration;" so as to read, "such arbitrators having been appointed."

Mr. ALLISON. I accept that, Mr. President, if I have any power to do so.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, in line 1, page 2, where it reads "the compensation of the members of said commission," it should read "of said arbitrators."

Mr. ALLISON. I would say "the members of said arbitration."

Mr. BAILEY. That is entirely satisfactory.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it read "the members of said arbitration" in line 1, page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves an amendment in line 7, page 1, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, strike out the word "commission" and insert in lieu thereof "arbitration."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, page 1, strike out "commission" and insert the word "arbitrators;" and on page 2, line 1, strike out "commission" and insert in lieu thereof the word "arbitration."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. The word "commission" occurs in the amendment which I offered in line 4, page 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. ALLISON. Let it be changed to "arbitration," so as to read "members of said arbitration."

The SECRETARY. Line 4, where the Senate struck out "President" and inserted "said commission," strike out the word "commission" and insert "arbitration or arbitrators."

Mr. BAILEY. If you use the word "members" you ought to use the word "arbitration;" so as to read, "members of said arbitration."

Mr. ALLISON. I think in line 4 it would be just as well to say "arbitration;" so as to read, "as may be fixed by said arbitration."

The SECRETARY. Strike out "commission" and insert "arbitration." It occurs in the amendment following the word "Government," also where it reads "$4,000 each; and for the employees of the said commission." Strike out "commission" and insert "arbitration."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It occurs in the proviso which precedes, offered by the committee:

Provided, That the members of said "commission," etc.

Strike out "commission" and insert "arbitration." It occurs three times in the proviso.

Mr. ALLISON. Wherever it occurs I ask that "commission" may be changed to "arbitration."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 13, page 2, strike out "commission" and insert "arbitration." In line 16, page 2, strike out "commission" and insert "arbitration."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is all.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, I believe that completes the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Shall the amendments be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

Mr. ALLISON. I hope so.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest that the title be amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will be changed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Arbitration appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain operators and miners."

ARTHUR P. LOVEJOY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I ask consent to call up House bill 3291, an urgent pension bill.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 3291) granting an increase of pension to Arthur P. Lovejoy, and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Arthur P. Lovejoy, late of Company C, First Regiment Vermont Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I had hoped to get up the militia bill this afternoon, but of course that is now out of the question. I therefore give notice that immediately after the routine morning business on Monday morning I shall ask that it be laid before the Senate for consideration.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, December 15, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate December 11, 1902.

CONSUL-GENERAL.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, December 11, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

FIRST REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT ARTILLERY.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery, for the purpose of having it printed in the RECORD.

The conference report is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Light Artillery, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 15794) to amend section 20 of an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 3975. An act to refund internal-revenue taxes paid by owners of private dies.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 3975. An act to refund internal-revenue taxes paid by owners of private dies—to the Committee on Claims.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 15794. An act to amend section 20 of an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE CHARLES A. RUSSELL.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the House to fix a time for memorial addresses upon the life, services, and character of the Hon. CHARLES A. RUSSELL, deceased, late a member of this body. With this object in view I beg leave to offer the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House meet on Sunday, the 25th day of January, 1903, at 12 o'clock noon, for eulogies upon the life, character, and services of the Hon. CHARLES ADDISON RUSSELL, deceased, late a member of this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF WAGONER AGAINST BUTLER.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the petition of Wagoner, the contestant, in the contested-election case of Wagoner against Butler, from the Twelfth district of Missouri, I present the following supplemental report, and ask immediate consideration of the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Further report of Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the petition of George C. R. Wagoner, contesting the election of James J. Butler from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri.

After the preparation and adoption of the original report, but previous to its presentation to the House, Mr. Butler and one of the minority members of the committee claiming not to have received their notices in time to appear at the meeting, another meeting of the committee was duly called, at which both parties were present, their statements heard, and the report as originally prepared readopted, with some slight changes in the form of the resolution, and in said amended form immediately presented to the House, December 5, 1902.

The committee now desires to add that at said hearing Mr. Wagoner, the contestant, declared his ability to take the testimony necessary to make out his case within fifteen days. Mr. Butler, being asked what time he would require, declined any estimate and denied the power of the House to modify the time for reply to notice of contest, taking of testimony, filing of briefs, etc., as fixed by statute. We have no hesitation in saying that there is no statute which can fetter this House in the exercise of the high privilege and important duty devolved upon it by the constitutional declaration that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members."

The first legislative action upon the subject was taken in the Fifth Congress, and resulted in the act which was approved by the President January 23, 1798. That bill was reported to the House by Mr. Harper, of South Carolina, from a select committee of five appointed for the purpose. In their report the committee unanimously conceded that the provisions of such a statute could not be enforced on any future House of Representatives, and that its only proper and necessary function would be to provide the mode in which testimony should be taken and grant the powers for the compelling of attending of witnesses, leaving it for each House to determine when testimony thus taken should be presented, whether it would receive it or not, "while the constitutional rights of each House would be saved by its power to adopt or reject the rule for the admission of the testimony."

In the Senate, however, an amendment was inserted as the result of which the act expired at the end of the first session of the Sixth, or next, Congress. Two or three subsequent attempts were made to enact legislation upon the subject, but the majority of the House seemed to have considered that such legislation would be wholly unconstitutional, and from that time until 1851 there was no method of taking testimony until the first session of the Congress to which the opposing parties claimed to have been elected, thus in ordinary cases deferring for more than a year even the commencement of a contest.

To remedy this difficulty Mr. William Strong, of Pennsylvania, afterwards a justice of the supreme court of that State and later of the Supreme Court of the United States, prepared and championed to its passage the act of 1851. To the argument that it was wholly unconstitutional because infringing upon the privileges of the House, he made much such reply as was embraced in the report made by Mr. Harper's committee to the Fifth Congress, contending that the act, as framed, would not and could not interfere with the constitutional rights of any subsequent House, because, as he said, "there is no provision restraining the power of the House to proceed in another manner." (Congressional Globe, p. 109.)

In the Thirty-fifth Congress, in the case of Brooks v. Davis, the House having been asked to depart from the provisions of the act of 1851, a minority of the committee filed a report in favor of granting the request. In said report they said:

"If it is claimed that the act of 1851 prevents the House of Representatives from pursuing an investigation in any other manner than prescribed by that act, it would then be wholly inoperative, coming into conflict with the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides 'each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.' No prior House of Representatives can prescribe rules on this subject of binding force upon its successor, nor can the Senate interfere to direct the mode of proceeding; the House of Representatives is not a continuing body, each body of Representatives having an independent and limited existence, and having the clear right to determine, in its own way, upon 'the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members.' A like authority is given, and in similar terms, to each House to 'determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior,' etc.; and no member will pretend that a general law, passed in such terms as the act of 1851, would restrain any House from acting on these subjects independently of the law."

That report was signed by four noted lawyers, among them Mr. L. Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, afterwards Attorney-General under President Cleveland and by him appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

See also the decision in United States v. Ballin (141 U. S., 1), unanimous opinion of the court written by Mr. Justice Brewer, Mr. Lamar being at that time a member of the court.

The majority report, presented by Mr. Boyce, of South Carolina, agreed with the minority as to the powers of the House, but held that in that particular case it was inexpedient to depart from the provisions of the statute until the contestant had first exercised all his rights thereunder.

In Williamson v. Sickles (1 Bart., 288) Mr. Dawes, of Massachusetts, presented the report of the committee, holding that the act of 1851 had no binding force upon the House. The minority report raised the direct issue by declaring "that it is not competent for the committee to recommend any action to the House which involves a violation of the law of 1851, because as a law of Congress it is obligatory alike upon the House, the committee, and the contestant." The resolution reported by the majority was adopted by the House—yeas 80, nays 64.

Other cases upon the subject in addition to Benoit v. Boatner in the Fifty-fourth Congress, are: Reeder v. Whitfield, Dailey v. Morton, Coffroth v. Koontz.

The Kentucky cases in the Fortieth Congress, Congressional Globe, first session, p. 546: Bisbee v. Finley, 2 Ells., 172; Jones v. Shelly, 2 Ells., 681; Rowell's Digest, 394; Fuller v. Dawson, 2 Bart., 126; McGrorty v. Hooper, 2 Bart., 211; Thomas v. Arnell, 2 Bart., 162; Hunt v. Sheldon, 2 Bart., 530; Sheafe v. Tillman, 2 Bart., 907; Kline v. Verree, 1 Bart., 574; Chapman v. Ferguson, 1 Bart., 267; Howard v. Cooper, 1 Bart., 275; Vallandingham v. Campbell, 1 Bart., 223; Bell v. Snyder, Smith, 247. See also Paine on Elections, sections 996 and 1003.

We therefore recommend the adoption of the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas James J. Butler having been returned as elected to membership in this Congress from the Twelfth district of Missouri, his right to such membership was contested on the ground of gross frauds in his election, and having heard said contest this House, on the 28th day of June, 1902, declared said Butler not to have been elected; and

Whereas an election having been held November 4, 1902, to fill the vacancy resulting from the said action of this House, the said Butler was again returned as elected from the said district, took the oath of office December 1, 1902, and now occupies a seat in this House, and George C. R. Wagoner has, through a member of the House, presented a memorial or petition claiming that he, and not the said Butler, was duly elected, alleging gross frauds in the election and showing that he has served upon said Butler a notice of contest; and

Whereas the full time allowed by statute for the taking of testimony, filing of briefs, etc., in such cases would extend beyond the term of the present House, thus preventing it from judging of the merits of the said contest, and the said Wagoner in his petition prays that by appropriate action such time shall be so shortened as that the controversy may be determined before the expiration of the Fifty-seventh Congress; and

Whereas Committee on Elections No. 2, to which said petition was referred, has reported that it awarded a hearing to both parties and that the said Wagoner declares his ability to take the testimony upon his side in fifteen days, and the said Butler making no estimate of the time that will be required by him, and denies the power of this House to shorten the time as fixed by the act of 1851, and other statutes; and

Whereas it is the sense of the House that this contest should be heard and decided at this session: Therefore

Resolved, That in the contested-election case of George C. R. Wagoner v. James J. Butler, from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, the contestee shall be required to serve upon contestant his answer to notice of contest on or before December 20, 1902, and that the time for taking and completing testimony in such case shall be limited as follows: The contestant shall be allowed from December 15, 1902, until and including January 3, 1903, in which to take testimony; the contestee shall be allowed from January 3, 1903, until and including January 27, 1903, for the taking of his testimony, and the contestant shall be allowed from January 27, 1903, until and including February 1, 1903, for the taking of testimony in rebuttal. As soon as the testimony shall have been received by the Clerk of this House it shall at once be referred to the Committee on Elections No. 2, and the said committee shall proceed to the consideration of the case; and, having first afforded to the parties an opportunity to be heard as to the merits of the same, shall report to this House its conclusions with respect to such case in time to afford to the House an opportunity to pass upon the same during the present session of Congress. Except so far as herein otherwise provided, this case shall be governed by the ordinary rules of procedure in contested Congressional election cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Is there any change in the resolution?

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no change in the resolution. It is a supplemental report; but there is no change in the resolution itself.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has the supplemental report been printed?

Mr. OLMSTED. It has not. I will state further that it consists of citations of authorities simply for historical reference.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think there ought to be some additional ones cited, for they are needed. I should like an opportunity to see the additional citations, for certainly the gentleman did not cite any which were sufficient in the original report. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to call up the case for action now, inasmuch as we have not seen the supplemental report and have not had our attention called to the authorities.

Mr. OLMSTED. I call up the resolution as privileged, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the resolution for the consideration of the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Before the case is entered upon for consideration, I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks we ought to be called upon to consider the case without any report?

Mr. OLMSTED. The report has been filed, there is no obligation upon the committee to file a supplemental report, and it simply files additional authorities for the information of the House at such time as any member may choose to read it.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee raise the question of consideration?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The question of consideration was taken; and the Speaker announced that the Chair was unable to decide, and appointed Mr. OLMSTED and Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee as tellers.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 136, noes 114.

So the House decided to consider the resolution.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF ANIMALS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Pennsylvania consents to yield to me a moment. I desire to report, from the Committee on Agriculture, a bill (H. R. 15922) to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to more completely eradicate contagious diseases of animals. This is in the nature of an emergency measure. It will be printed and on file to-morrow morning, and I wish to give notice that I will ask for its immediate consideration at that time. I am so directed by the Committee on Agriculture.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, by direction from the Committee on Agriculture, reports a special appropriation bill in regard to stamping out diseases of cattle now spreading throughout the country, and he gives notice that he will call it up for consideration to-morrow. The bill will be printed with the report, and will go to the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve all points of order on the bill.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF WAGONER AGAINST BUTLER.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to ask gentlemen on the other side whether we can make an arrangement as to the disposition of time to be consumed in this debate?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. The resolution presented here, as I construe it, is directly in the teeth of more than one statute of the United States. I wish to raise that question now, if this is the proper time to do so, and to insist that it is not within the power of the House of Representatives to pass this resolution. I could not raise this point while the question of consideration was pending, but I now raise it, and I desire at this time to be heard on that point. I make the point that the resolution is not privileged because it is directly in the teeth of the statutes; and if it is privileged it ought not to be passed.

The SPEAKER. Answering the parliamentary inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, the Chair calls attention to several decisions holding that, the House having voted to consider a measure, a point of order against it comes too late. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire at this time to offer an amendment to this resolution—to insert in line 5 of the printed copy——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the floor unless he yields.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was simply stating my proposition. I ask the gentleman to yield for the purpose of allowing an amendment, to insert in line 5 of the printed resolution the word "twentieth" instead of "fifteenth."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for that amendment?

Mr. OLMSTED. I prefer that the gentleman should make it a little later in the discussion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow it to be offered now and considered pending?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And if the gentleman will permit——

The SPEAKER. With this understanding the amendment will be sent up and read, so that the House may comprehend it, and it will be considered as pending for consideration at the proper time.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1 strike out the word "fifteenth," in line 5, and insert the word "twentieth;" so as to read: "Notice of contest on or before December 20, 1902."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And with the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I desire to offer a substitute resolution, which I hope he will allow to be read now and considered as pending.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for the purpose of having this proposition read?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That after a reasonable time has been given by Election Committee No. 2 to contestee to file his answer to the notice of contest, that a subcommittee of five be appointed by the chairman of the Committee on Elections No. 2 to make a full and thorough investigation of the contested election case of George C. R. Wagoner against James J. Butler, from the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri; to take and report all the evidence in regard to the methods of said election, and as to whether the contestant or the contestee or either of them was lawfully elected, and report such evidence to the said Committee on Elections, and said committee will report said evidence and its findings to the House for further action.

Said subcommittee is empowered to issue subpœnas for witnesses, to send for persons and papers, to employ a stenographer and deputy sergeant-at-arms, and to sit during sessions of the House. Said subcommittee may proceed to Missouri, if deemed necessary by them, to take any part of said testimony. That all expenses of said committee shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House. That all vouchers or expenditures shall be certified by the chairman of the subcommittee of the said Committee on Elections. The Clerk of this House is authorized to advance the necessary funds to the chairman of said subcommittee upon his drafts therefor in sums not exceeding $1,000 at any one time, to be accounted for under the terms of this resolution, under the supervision of the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for the purpose of allowing this proposition to be pending for consideration?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. It will be so understood by the Chair.

Mr. OLMSTED. I now ask the gentleman from Indiana what arrangement can be made as to the amount of time to be consumed in the discussion of this matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I think that two hours on a side would not be too much, and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to propose that to the House.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would suggest to the gentleman that, as we do not propose to and could not, probably, in the discussion of this resolution, go into the merits of the election contest, it seems to me that that is too much time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But the gentleman readily understands that this now is a case where the exigency requires consideration of the election contest in the life of this Congress—within three months—and it is important for Congress to know some of the matters that are involved in the case. In order to have that understanding and to properly judge of the merits of these two propositions, I think it is important that the matter should be thoroughly understood, with a statement of enough of the facts to enable the House to judge as to the merits of the respective propositions presented to it; and as this is the first time that Elections Committee No. 2 has asked the House of Representatives in six years for any time, except to confirm its unanimous action, I think the gentleman ought not to object to the two hours on a side.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask if the gentleman would then be willing to agree that the previous question be considered as ordered at the expiration of the time agreed upon for debate upon the resolution, the substitute, and the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The tendency, of course, would be to cut out all other amendments; and while I know of none, and my colleagues on the committee know of none, yet I think that rule at this time would be too drastic. I think there will be no difficulty about it, however.

Mr. OLMSTED. I think if we agree to so long a time, when I am sure this side of the House does not desire it, and our side having, of course, the burden, we ought to have a definite understanding that the matter close at the expiration of that time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think the gentleman has a right to close it at that time. He has a right to move it at the expiration of that time. Personally, I have no objection to it, but the tendency would be to cut off amendments that may be considered proper by the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER. What is the request submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask unanimous consent that three hours be allotted to the discussion of this resolution, amendment, and substitute, now pending, one half to be controlled by myself and the other by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the debate be limited to three hours, one half to be controlled by himself and the other by the gentleman from Indiana. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, at the regular election at which members to the Fifty-seventh Congress were elected, James J. Butler was returned as elected from the Twelfth district of Missouri, composed of the city of St. Louis. He was sworn in as a member and his seat immediately contested upon the ground of gross frauds in the election. That contest was heard by the appropriate committee and by this House, which decided on the 28th day of June, 1902, that he had not been lawfully elected. It held that nobody had been elected. A special election was held on the 4th day of November, 1902, to fill the vacancy thus occasioned. As the result of that election Mr. Butler was again returned as having been chosen to fill the vacancy occasioned by his own unseating in this House. There has been presented through an honorable member of this body the petition of George C. R. Wagoner, claiming that he and not the said Butler was duly elected at said special election, for the remainder of this Fifty-seventh Congress. Mr. Wagoner accompanies his petition with a copy of the notice of contest and with sworn statements, which convince your committee that his contest is made in good faith. But, according to the act of 1851 and the amendatory statutes of 1873, 1875, and 1887, the time allowed for the contestee, the sitting member, to serve his answer is thirty days.

The time for the taking of testimony is forty days upon the one side, then forty upon the other, and ten days in rebuttal, or ninety days in all. Then, under the law of 1887, sixty days more are allowed for filing briefs, so that, in the ordinary course, under these statutes this case could not be presented to this House for its consideration before the 1st of next July, whereas by constitutional limitation the term of this House, as well as the term for which Mr. Wagoner claims to have been elected, will expire in March. That being the case, the petitioner asks that by appropriate action the House will so shorten the time as to permit of the decision of the contest at this session.

Your committee had both parties before it. The contestant, upon whom, of course, rests the burden of proof, averred his ability to prove his case within fifteen days. The contestee, Mr. Butler, declined to make any estimate of the time required by him, but denied the power of the committee or of the House to shorten the time as fixed by statute. In other words, coming up here claiming to have been elected to fill the vacancy caused by our rejection of his former credentials, he points to the statute that prevents our consideration of his case, and, figuratively speaking, applies his thumb to his nose, gyrates his fingers in our direction, and asks, "What are you going to do about it?"

Now, the question is whether this House will exercise the high prerogative and privilege conferred upon it by the Constitution, which says that each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members. Taking the contestant at his word, the committee has recommended a resolution which allows him fifteen days, exclusive of Sundays and holidays, for the taking of testimony. We have then allowed the sitting member twenty days to take testimony in reply, and the contestant five days in rebuttal, upon the return of that testimony the committee to proceed immediately to the consideration of the case and report it to this House in time for its action at this session.

Now, it is claimed by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], and I have no doubt that a great deal of the burden of the argument upon the other side will be, that we propose to disregard the provisions of the statute of 1851. We do. We claim that right.

The Constitution is over and above and beyond the reach of any act of Congress. It imposes upon "each House" a duty to perform, and our position is that upon the performance of that duty no previous House could impose any restriction or condition whatever which, though concurred in by the Senate and approved by the President, is in any way binding upon this present House any further than it chooses to be bound.

I have taken some pains to examine into the history of such legislation, and of the action of successive Houses under it, and have found, as I supposed, that it never was intended, even by the framers of this legislation, that it could or should have any binding effect upon any future House, and also that the House itself has always, upon proper cause shown, claimed and exercised the power of disregarding and setting aside in any particular case the provisions and requirements of this statute, and of proceeding otherwise, as the requirements of the particular case seemed to demand, frequently in direct conflict with the provisions of the act of 1851.

The very first legislation upon the subject occurred in the Fifth Congress. Certain resolutions upon the subject were submitted and considered in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Sitgreaves, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Gordon, of New Hampshire, and others, argued that such a resolution would not be binding upon any future House. The Committee of the Whole seems to have been very strongly of that opinion, as it rose without taking action, and leave was refused to sit again. It having been suggested, however, in debate that a bill might be passed to do away with the inconvenience arising from the fact that there was no law obliging witnesses to give their depositions in contested-election cases, a motion was made and carried for the appointment of a select committee of five—to take the subject-matter itself under consideration and report their opinion generally to the House.

The entire membership of the committee is not given, but its report was submitted to the House December 15, 1797, by Mr. Harper, of South Carolina, a very prominent lawyer in his day.

That report, which appears to have been unanimously adopted, was presented by Mr. Harper, of South Carolina, a very eminent lawyer in his day. The committee recommended the passage of a law making provision for the taking of testimony, compelling the attendance of witnesses, etc., and in their report said:

As to the objection, that such a law could enact no sanctions by which the admission of testimony, taken in pursuance of its provisions, could be enforced on any future House of Representatives, the committee do not consider it as of sufficient weight to prevent the adoption of the measure; even the utility of which they do not suppose would be, in any considerable degree, diminished by this objection.

And I ask the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] particularly to attend to this language:

The proper and the only necessary functions of such a law would be to prescribe the mode in which testimony should be taken, and to grant powers for compelling the attendance of witnesses. Whether testimony thus obtained should be admitted in any particular case, or whether further testimony should be required, must depend on the decision of that House before which such case should come for discussion; and it would be in the power of each House, at the commencement of its first session, to adopt a rule declaring that in all cases of contested elections to come before it testimony taken pursuant to such law should be received. This, it is presumable, would be done, and would gradually grow into a constant and well-known regulation, to which all persons engaged in contested elections might with safety conform. It would still be in the power of each House to refrain from passing such a resolution and to reject the testimony; but it ought not to be presumed that when the mode should have been perfected by experience, and becoming generally known, testimony fairly taken in conformity to it would be rejected. On the contrary, there would be a strong and well-founded presumption that such testimony would be received; and this presumption, joined to the aid which the law would afford in compelling witnesses to attend, would enable persons concerned in contested elections to come at first duly prepared for the trial, while the constitutional rights of each House would be saved by its power to adopt or reject the rule for the admission of the testimony.

To adopt this rule at the beginning of each Congress, before it should be known to what particular cases it was to apply, would, moreover, preclude those inconveniences which result from the discussion of general principles in connection with particular cases.

Conformably to these ideas the committee recommend that a law be passed prescribing the mode in which and the persons before whom testimony in cases of contested elections for this House shall be taken, and giving power to compel the attendance of witnesses for that purpose.

That report may be found in American State Papers, miscellaneous, volume 1, page 159, and the proceedings in relation to the matter in Annals of Congress, volume 5, part 1, Fifth Congress, first and second sessions.

On December 18 the House and Committee of the Whole agreed to the committee's report without debate, and directed that it bring in a bill in accordance with its recommendations. Such a bill was presented, and appears to have been passed by the House unanimously and without debate. It was entitled:

An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections of members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses—and was approved by the President January 23, 1798.

The Senate, however, appears to have had some doubts upon the subject, for the bill was referred to a select committee of three, which reported an amendment unanimously—

That this act shall continue and be in force until the end of the first session of the Sixth Congress and no longer.

From that time until 1851 there was no law providing for the taking of testimony, and in contested-election cases nothing could be done until the meeting of the Congress, more than a year after the election. The contestant then presented his memorial to the House, and a committee was sent from the House to examine witnesses and procure the necessary evidence. The result was that such contest could not be decided until a large part of the life of the Congress had passed away. A person not entitled to his seat frequently occupied it for many months, while the rightful occupant was as long excluded, and in the end the Government had frequently to pay the salaries of both the parties for the same period.

To remedy this evil and to expedite the decision of such cases by providing a method of taking testimony in advance of the sitting of Congress, the act of 1851 was prepared, introduced, and championed to its passage by Mr. William Strong, of my own State of Pennsylvania, afterwards a justice of the supreme court of that State, and later a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

During the consideration of the bill, objection was made to its constitutionality, particularly by Mr. Jones, of Tennessee, who denied the authority of the President or Senate to take any part whatever in relation to such contest, the Constitution providing, as he said, "That each House must be a law to itself with respect to the election and qualification of its members." Mr. Jones referred particularly to the provision requiring the contestant to serve his notice of contest within thirty days after the lawful determination of the result of the election. Upon this point, Mr. Strong said:

I heard it suggested the other day when this bill was read that it took away the power of the House to judge of its own elections. There is no such provision in it. There is one section of the bill which provides that every contestant shall give the notice and may take testimony in the mode prescribed. There is no provision restraining the power of the House to proceed in another manner. (Congressional Globe, p. 109.)

His entire remarks show that the intention of the framers of the law were to expedite the taking of testimony and preparation of cases for the consideration of the Elections Committee and of the House itself, so that, as he declared, instead of months of delay during which a person wrongfully occupying a seat might hold it to the exclusion of the rightful member, the country meanwhile paying the salaries of both, there could be a decision soon after the meeting of Congress, the testimony having been previously taken.

It is manifest from his speech, taken as a whole, and from the remarks of others during the passage of the bill, that it was not the intention or expectation that its provisions would be binding upon any future House, but that if expressly or impliedly adopted by each succeeding House, the regulations thus provided would enable the contesting parties to take their testimony in advance of the meeting of the House in which they claim membership. "There is," said Mr. Strong, "no provision restraining the power of the House to proceed in another manner." In other words, the notion of the House in 1851 was the same as that which obtained in 1798, namely, that the regulations provided would not be binding upon any future House, but would be of great convenience to each future House that should choose to adopt or accept them. Their thought was that the statute would be binding upon all parties except the House.

In the Senate the act of 1851 does not appear to have been debated at all. Mr. Bradbury, who moved its passage, said:

I ask it as a matter of courtesy of the House. It affects them and can not go into operation without our action upon it.

The bill was thereupon passed by the Senate and afterward approved by the President.

The ruling, or at least the action of every House in which the question has been raised, from 1851 down to the present time, has been in entire accord with the views expressed, as I have already shown, by the framers of the act of 1798 and again by the framers of the act of 1851. The question was indeed raised a very few years after the passage of the act of 1851.

In the Thirty-fourth Congress, in 1856, in Archer v. Allen, the majority of the committee reported that they regarded the act of 1851 "as directory merely and not as absolutely controlling the action of the House or of the committee," and they permitted the contest to be governed outside of and in conflict with the provisions of the statute. The minority, however, in their report, held the act to be peremptory and binding.

The House sustained the majority and unseated the sitting member—94 to 90. The case is reported in 1 Bartlett, 169, and in Rowell's Digest, 762.

On February 14, 1856, Mr. A. H. Reeder gave his first notice of intention to contest the seat of Mr. Whitfield, a Delegate from Kansas, claiming to have been elected October 1, 1855. The act of 1851 requires notice of contest to be served within thirty days from the election and allows ninety days for the taking of testimony. Although nearly five months after the election Mr. Reeder had neither served notice of contest, nor taken testimony, nor in any other respect complied with the terms of the act of 1851, upon the presentation of his memorial that act was discussed in the House. It was claimed by some that while it in terms applied to States only, by implication it extended also to contested elections in Territories. But it was argued, apparently with prevailing effect, by Mr. Israel Washburne, of Maine, that even if it did apply to Territorial contests, the act of 1851 could not prevent the House, under the Constitution, from passing such orders and resolutions to procure testimony, whether by witnesses or depositions, as it might think proper. By resolution of the House, a special committee was appointed consisting of John Sherman of Ohio, William A. Howard of Michigan, and Mordecai Oliver of Missouri. The report of that committee was referred by the House to the Committee on Elections, whose report and the action of the House thereon unseated Mr. Whitfield by a vote of 110 to 92. A resolution to admit Mr. Reeder was defeated by a vote of 88 to 113, so the seat became vacant.

In the Thirty-fifth Congress, February 12, 1858, Henry P. Brooks, of Baltimore, addressed a memorial to Congress, stating that he had served notice of contest upon Henry Winter Davis, and setting forth reasons why he ought not to be required to proceed under the act of 1851, urged the House to decide the contest "By evidence summoned to the presence of the House or by full investigation by a committee with adequate powers." His memorial was referred to the Elections Committee, which reported that the reasons stated in the memorial were not sufficient to induce the House to go beyond the act of 1851. The minority presented a report in favor of granting his request. I desire to call the attention of gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber to that report. It proceeds thus:

If it is claimed that the act of 1851 prevents the House of Representatives from pursuing an investigation in any other manner than prescribed by that act, it would then be wholly inoperative, coming into conflict with the fifth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, which provides "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." No prior House of Representatives can prescribe rules on this subject of binding force upon its successor, nor can the Senate interfere to direct the mode of proceeding; the House of Representatives is not a continuing body, each body of Representatives having an independent and limited existence, and having the clear right to determine in its own way upon "the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." A like authority is given, and in similar terms, to each House to "determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members for disorderly behavior," etc.; and no member will pretend that a general law, passed in such terms as the act of 1851, would restrain any House from acting on these subjects independently of the law.

This report was signed by Henry M. Phillips, of Pennsylvania; Thomas L. Harris, of Illinois; John W. Stevenson, of Kentucky, and Lucius Q. C. Lamar, of Mississippi, afterwards Attorney-General under President Cleveland, and by him appointed a justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, which position he occupied to the day of his death. He was an active member of that court on the 29th day of February, 1892, when he concurred in the opinion that day filed by Justice Brewer in United States v. Ballin, reported in 144 United States Reports, commencing at page 1, in which, passing upon the rule adopted by this House in 1890 for the counting of a quorum by the Speaker, that court said:

The Constitution empowers each House to determine its rules of proceedings. It may not by its rules ignore constitutional restraints or violate fundamental rights, and there should be a reasonable relation between the mode or method of proceeding established by the rule and the result which is sought to be attained. But within these limitations all matters of method are open to the determination of the House, and it is no impeachment of the rule to say that some other way would be better, more accurate, or even more just. It is no objection to the validity of a rule that a different one has been prescribed and in force for a length of time. The power to make rules is not one which, once exercised, is exhausted. It is a continuous power, always subject to be exercised by the House, and, within the limits suggested, absolute and beyond the challenge of any other body or tribunal.

In the debate in the House, in Davis v. Brooks, Mr. Boyce, of South Carolina, who had presented the majority report, said:

I suppose there is no difference of opinion as to the law of the case. By the Constitution the House is made the "judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." This power, being granted by the Constitution, is above all law, and can not be taken away or impaired by any law. * * * There is no doubt, then, as to the power of the House to proceed, independently of the act of 1851, in this case. If the House thinks proper, it can, through a committee or by a commission, take the testimony in this case. The only question is as to the expediency of so doing. The question for the House is not as to its power—that is conceded; the question is as to the propriety of the exercise of that power in this particular case. I am decidedly of opinion that the House should not interfere in the matter, but let the parties concerned prosecute the case under the act of 1851.

Mr. Phillips, of Pennsylvania, who had presented the minority report, said:

Attempts were made to enact similar laws in 1806, in 1810, and in 1820, and on all those occasions the power of Congress to regulate the mode of taking proof in inquiries into the validity of elections was denied by a majority of the body. In 1851 this law was passed. The minority of the committee * * * most emphatically deny that there is any power in this law, or that there is power in any law the Congress of this nation can pass, to restrict either the House of Representatives or the Senate from inquiring into the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members. The Constitution prevents it. It says that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Each House, the minority claim, has the right to judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, just as each House may, by the grant of power in similar language, determine the rules of its own proceedings; and that an attempt upon the part of a prior Congress, or an attempt upon the part of a coordinate branch, to restrain and restrict this House from looking into the returns and elections of its own members would be as futile and vain as similar attempts would be to regulate the rules of proceedings of this House.

Mr. Wilson, of Indiana, in reply, said:

I think, and a majority of the committee agree, that this law of 1851 is not imperative; that it is not binding, and that is a sufficient answer to the position of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Phillips] in regard to his constitutional objection. We do not consider the law of 1851 as imperative, but we do consider it a good, safe, and proper rule to be adopted by the House and by the committee in all contested-election cases.

Mr. Bowie, of Maryland, said:

But when you come to form it into a law, and the legislative power of the Government—the Congress—and the Executive come to tell us how we are to regulate the rules of our House, I pass it by as a usurpation, and it falls dead beneath my feet. The power of that law of 1851 is nothing—nothing as as a law, certainly.

Mr. Washburn, of Maine, said:

I think that the law of 1851, though I hold it to be merely directory, provides for taking testimony under it.

The House appears to have been nearly, if not quite, unanimously of the opinion that it was in no wise bound by the act of 1851, but it adopted the committee's resolution to the effect, in that particular case, there still being time for the taking of testimony under the act of 1851 it was inexpedient to adopt the other method desired by the contestant.

I have quite a long list of cases in which the House has disregarded the act of 1851. It would be a waste of time to discuss them all at length, but as matter of historical interest I shall, with the consent of the House, include some reference to them as part of my remarks. I wish now to invite attention to a very important ruling upon this precise point.

In the Thirty-sixth Congress, in 1860, the question whether the act of 1851 had any binding force upon a subsequent House was fairly and squarely presented for consideration in a case which has since been considered the ruling case upon the subject.

The seat of Daniel E. Sickles, of New York, was contested by Amor J. Williamson. He did not proceed under the act of 1851; he filed no notice of contest, as required by that act, and took no testimony. More than a year after the election he presented a petition to the House asking for a committee to take testimony.

The matter was referred to the Elections Committee. Mr. Dawes of Massachusetts presented its report, in which the majority said:

The committee do not consider the law of 1851 as absolute binding force upon this House, for by the Constitution each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members, and no previous House and Senate can judge for them. The committee, however, consider that act as a wholesome rule, not to be departed from except for cause.

The report was signed by five members. It recommended the adoption of a resolution providing that Williamson serve upon Sickles within ten days a particular statement of the grounds of his contest; that Sickles be required to serve his answer in twenty days, and that sixty days be allowed for the taking of testimony after the service of answer, the testimony to be taken before some justice of the supreme court of the State of New York, residing in the city of New York. This method was wholly at variance with the act of 1851.

Mr. John A. Gilmer presented the report of the minority, opposing the resolution and declaring squarely—

That it is not competent for the committee to recommend any action to the House which involves a violation of the law of 1851, because as a law of Congress it is obligatory alike upon the House, the committee, and the contestant; that the act relating exclusively to the initiation of the proceedings, the taking of testimony, and the preparation of the case for the decision of the House, does not infringe upon the constitutional prerogative of the House to judge of the election, return, and qualifications of its members.

The resolution reported by the majority was adopted by the House—yeas 80, nays 64. This case is reported in 1 Bartlett, page 288.

In the Thirty-seventh Congress, July 8, 1861, the House, without debate or division, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the papers in the case of the contested seat of the Delegate from the Territory of Nebraska be referred to the Committee on Elections, and that they be authorized to investigate and report on the same without regard to notice.

In the Thirty-ninth Congress, December 5, 1865, the governor of Pennsylvania having failed to certify which party had been elected, the House passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the certificates and all other papers relating to the election in the Sixteenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania be referred to the Committee of Elections, when appointed, with instructions to report, at as early a day as practicable, which of the rival claimants to the vacant seat from that district has the prima facie right thereto, reserving to the other party the privilege of contesting the case upon the merits without prejudice from the lapse of time or want of notice.

The majority of the committee reported January 26, 1866, that Coffroth had the prima facie right to the seat, and recommended the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That William H. Koontz, desiring to contest the right of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth to a seat in this House as a Representative from the Sixteenth district of the State of Pennsylvania, be, and he is, required to serve upon the said Coffroth, within fifteen days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest, and that the said Coffroth be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Koontz his answer thereto within fifteen days thereafter, and that both parties be allowed sixty days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denials, notice of intention to examine witnesses to be given to the opposite party at least five days before their examination, but neither party to give notice of taking testimony within less than five days between the close of taking it at one place and its commencement at another, but in all other respects in the manner prescribed in the act of February 19, 1851.

The report of the majority was sustained, Coffroth was seated, and Koontz became the contestant. As the result of the contest, Coffroth was unseated and his seat given to Koontz.

It will be observed that both the majority and minority of the committee, and the entire House, appear without dissent to have considered the act of 1851 as of no binding force, the entire contest having been carried on outside of, and in conflict with, its provisions.

In the Fortieth Congress, July 9, 1867, Mr. Dawes, from the Committee on Elections, presented the following resolution, which was agreed to by the House:

Resolved, That in each of the cases of contested election from Kentucy the time for taking the testimony is hereby extended to the 1st day of December next, in all things conforming to existing law, except that such testimony may be taken before a notary public.

Mr. Randall of Pennsylvania participated in the debate. No one raised any question as to the competency of the last two lines, which were in direct conflict with the act of 1851. (See Congressional Globe, Fortieth Congress, first session, p. 546.)

In the case of Bisbee v. Finley, as reported in 2 Ellsworth, page 172, it was held that—

The provisions of the statute in reference to the taking of testimony in these cases are directory, constituting only convenient rules of practice; and the House is at liberty, in its discretion, to determine that the ends of justice require a different course.

In that case the minority report was presented by Mr. F. E. Beltzhoover, of Pennsylvania, a prominent lawyer and Democrat, now living in my own district. In that report this language is used:

The House is the exclusive judge of the qualifications, elections, and returns of its own members. In the exercise of this prerogative it is not bound by the technical rules of judicial procedure, nor even by its own precedents. These may be persuasive, and in so far as they embody the wisdom of experience, enlighten the mind and contribute to right conclusions. In the exercise of this attribute of sovereignty the House is charged in the ultimate with the maintenance of the right paramount and preservative of all other rights—the elective franchise. Therefore the House is absolutely untrammeled and answerable only to the sovereignty where this power emanates. The electors can and should accept no apology for any evasion or abuse; every case should be decided upon its own merits, and electors should accept no other conclusion than the vindication in fact of the right of representation.

In the Forty-seventh Congress a case arose analogous to the one in hand. A special election had been held in the Fourth Congressional district of Alabama November 7, 1882, to fill a vacancy caused by the unseating of Charles M. Shelley. The time for taking testimony, under the act of 1851, would extend beyond March 4, when Congress would expire by constitutional limitation. The contestant asked that some other mode of procedure be prescribed. January 22, 1883, Mr. Raney, from the Committee on Elections, reported in favor of appointing a special committee to take testimony, with power to send for persons and papers. Mr. Beltzhoover, from the same committee, in behalf of the minority, filed a report holding that no good cause had been shown and alleging negligence on the part of the contestant. The minority, however, admitted that the act of 1851 was not binding, and in its report said:

It is true that it has been held that the acts of Congress regulating contests are only directory and not imperative, and may therefore be disregarded by the House if it sees proper to do so; but all the best interests of fair trial and just judicial determination are largely subserved by adhering to the regular prescribed methods. McCrary says: "They (the statutes regulating the mode of contesting elections) constitute wholesome rules not to be departed from without cause" (sec. 349). This was settled by the House in the case of Williamson v. Sickles (1 Bartlett, 288). The contestant, through his memorial, asks Congress to take a short cut outside of the law for the disposition of the case by the appointment of a special committee, with summary powers and authority to act according to its own discretion. There are strong reasons why this extraordinary relief should be refused and the regular practice be adhered to.

First. The contestant complains that the time is insufficient to finish his contest in the way prescribed by the statute. But there is no evidence that this is so, and even if it were, he has been guilty of laches in conducting his case. He might have begun about thirty days sooner than he did and thereby saved a large portion of the brief time which of necessity remained to him to test his rights, and which he now complains is too short.

The case is reported in 2 Ellsworth, page 681, and in Rowell's Digest, page 394.

In Paine on Elections, section 996, referring to the act of 1851, the learned author says:

It is provided by law that a party proposing to contest the right to a seat in the House of Representatives of the United States shall, within thirty days after the determination of the result, serve upon the party in whose favor the result shall have been determined a notice specifying the grounds of the contest; but, while the failure to serve such notice will exclude the party from the privileges of a technical contest, it will not affect the power of the House, in its own discretion, to investigate the case and to award the seat to the party lawfully entitled thereto.

And, again, in section 1003, he says, concerning the same statute:

The statutory provision prescribing the time within which the notice of contest is to be served is not obligatory upon the House of Representatives. A mere failure to serve this notice within the period limited by the statute will not always result in the dismissal of the contest without a trial of the case on its merits. The Federal Constitution does not permit the House to be fettered by this statute. Since the enactment of the statute of 1851 no contest has been dismissed without a trial on the merits upon the sole ground that the notice was not served within the period of thirty days limited in the statute.

The following cases also have more or less bearing upon this question: Fuller v. Dawson, 2 id., 126; McGrorty v. Hooper, 2 Bart., 211; Thomas v. Arnell, id., 162; Hunt v. Sheldon, id., 530; Sheafe v. Tillman, id., 907; Kline v. Verree, 1 Bart., 574; Chapman v. Ferguson, id., 267; Howard v. Cooper, id., 275; Vallandigham v. Campbell, id., 223; Bell v. Snyder, Smith, 247.

And there is the very recent case of Benoil v. Boatner, in the Fifty-fourth Congress. There was no discussion of the question, but the action of the House was in conflict with the law of 1851 and the law of 1887.

I do not desire to consume time unnecessarily, and shall dwell no longer upon that aspect of the case. Here we are confronted by the proposition that if we adhere to these provisions of the act of 1851 we can not hear and determine this case at this session. The gentleman we have once rejected as not legally elected comes up here from the same district. Practically the same allegations are made as those which were proved in the first contest. The contestant shows evidence of some faith and claims to be able in fifteen days to prove his case. The only question is, Shall we hear him or shall we not? Shall we exercise the powers which the Constitution devolves upon us and obey the command which it places upon us to judge of the elections, qualifications, and returns of members of this House, or shall we sit here supinely and let this matter go?

If it is proper at this time to refer to the substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], the objection to it is that it provides a plan which would consume even more time than to proceed under the act of 1851. It authorizes a committee of this House to go to Missouri and take testimony. The statute now provides that testimony may be taken in two or more places at the same time. The taking of testimony can go on at a dozen different places simultaneously. If this House appoints a committee, it can sit only in one place at one time. It would take ten times as long to take the testimony in that way as it would to take it in the usual way, and of course it could not come before the House in time for consideration at this session. Let us so proceed that the testimony may be concluded, the case heard, and justice done before the Fifty-seventh Congress passes into history. [Applause.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this contest is precipitated on the contestee, on the Committee of Elections No. 2, and on the House by the circumstances of the case, and in them only can a justification be found for these unusual proceedings.

It does not come to us in the usual and orderly way provided by law for the determination of election contests.

We do not deny the power of this House to make all needful rules and regulations to secure purity and regularity in the election of its members. This is fundamental and exists by virtue of the constitutional provision "each House shall be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members."

This plenary right is not abridged by a former legislative enactment.

The House has the power in the modes outlined in the resolution presented and the substitute offered thereto to take such action as in its judgment will secure a determination of this contest, if possible, in the limited time allotted, measured by the life of this Congress.

Three questions appeal to our judgments at the very threshhold of this inquiry, when we come to fix what time would give a fair and judicial determination of this case within which it must be circumscribed to be decided at all.

Missouri, a sovereign State, has her laws to secure the fair election of her Representatives, and, the presumption attending the last election under the State laws, we have the contestee, her Representative, holding a certificate of her governor and a sitting member. The rights of individual citizens must be subordinated to the rights and interests of the State so far as to exclude this House and the Federal authority from deciding against the State till a case fully considered is made out against the regularity of the election.

The House is interested deeply for the security of its membership and the integrity of its proceedings to see that the fullest opportunity is given, the best efforts made, and the fullest time accorded to investigate, hear, and determine questions involving the rights of the State and the rights of the House.

The wisdom of Congress that has stood the test of half a century has given us the mode of procedure that governs in election cases.

The contestant has rights and interests in the contest as has the contestee, but these must be submerged to the other two great interests of the State and of the House.

Whoever holds a seat represents his State as he understands her interests to the best of his ability, and no State should have her accredited representative disturbed except upon the safest and surest grounds.

Nor should politics cloud our judgments on this proposition.

There is no politics in it. You can not get a proposition involving politics from Elections Committee No. 2, and I point with pride to its spotless record of six years in three Congresses, where this Elections Committee has never divided, but were always unanimous, and only occupied the attention of the House when it wanted the House to confirm, as it wisely and generously did, its conclusions, seating Democrats and Republicans alike. So there is no politics in the case in the committee. If politics entered into it, it would be Missouri politics, on the side of allowing the contest to go on. We know the results in districts of unseating sitting members. We find it here. Before I get through I will show you the condition that prevailed in the State of Missouri where a factional fight produced the result—the election of Mr. Butler by an overwhelming majority of 6,000.

The law governing election contests, so far as it concerns us, and which have been considered safe and wholesome procedure till now, was passed in 1851, and provides:

Whenever any person intends to contest an election of any member of the House of Representatives of the United States, he shall, within thirty days after the result of such election shall have been determined by the officer or board of canvassers authorized by law to determine the same, give notice in writing, to the member whose seat he designs to contest, of his intention to contest the same, and, in such notice, shall specify particularly the grounds upon which he relies in the contest. (R. S., sec. 105.)

Any member upon whom the notice mentioned in the preceding section may be served shall, within thirty days after the service thereof, answer such notice, admitting or denying the facts alleged therein, and stating specifically any other grounds upon which he rests the validity of his election, and shall serve a copy of his answer upon the contestant. (R. S., sec. 106.)

In all contested election cases the time allowed for taking testimony shall be ninety days, and the testimony shall be taken in the following order: The contestant shall take testimony during the first forty days, the returned member during the succeeding forty days, and the contestant may take testimony in rebuttal only during the remaining ten days of said period. (R. S., sec. 107.)

By the act of March 2, 1875, it is provided that section 107, Revised Statutes, shall be construed as requiring all testimony in cases of contested election to be taken within ninety days from the day on which the answer of the returned member is served upon the contestant. The law further provides that as soon as the testimony in any case is printed the Clerk shall forward by mail, if desired, two copies thereof to the contestant and the same number to the contestee; and shall notify the contestant to file with the Clerk, within thirty days, a brief of the facts and the authorities relied on to establish his case. The Clerk shall forward by mail two copies of the contestant's brief to the contestee with like notice.

These laws stand as a bulwark to State rights to the integrity of the State laws. You seek to change their entire scope and sphere and cramp within a narrow compass the consideration of an election case because some contestant is interested. How is this contest presented to the House? By a petition of a citizen of the State of Missouri, the contestant himself the only signer. The contestant is not a resident of the district for which he seeks to carry on this contest; but by a petition he presents to this House the points stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], and asks us to fly in the face of long-established law, to determine in this unusual way a contest that can not be carefully prepared and determined in the time that the committee proposes to fix.

The last Butler contest, involving these same propositions, was heard on only one side, and there are 2,200 pages of testimony, and every question there involved is involved in the petition here presented. Was there surplusage in that case? Was the evidence not germane? I cite the language of the report of the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TAYLER] in that case, where he says:

A vast amount of testimony was taken, a surprisingly large portion of which was relevant to the issue.

Yet, in the space of twenty days, where before the contestant alone had fifty days, this case must be cramped, and members must judicially determine this contest on that kind of an insufficiently prepared case.

What else do we find? About a thousand witnesses were examined on only one side. Look at their names [exhibiting pages containing names of witnesses], a thousand witnesses. Mr. Butler took no evidence, but the 2,200 pages of the record was the evidence of contestant only. Yet the House is asked to break down the law in order to give a hearing to this contest in this brief time in order to give a hearing to a contest of which the Elections Committee at the last session said:

It appears that about 5,000 votes were cast for the contestee, about 2,000 for the contestant, under names and addresses which careful canvass could not discover as representing actual residents. We can not apply one rule of inference to one side and refuse to apply it to the other; nor can we, when so many votes apparently tainted with fraud are involved, determine that he who has least benefited by them shall be declared elected.

That is the language of the committee in the contest involving the same questions that are in this. Then again they say:

In so far as the force of this particular item of testimony is alone considered, unaffected by the other evidence in the case, it would appear that the iniquity of the Republican managers differed from that of the Democratic managers only in degree.

This is the case presented to us. This is the kind of case in which it is proposed that we in an irregular manner shall unduly limit the time. If you open up the field on such considerations as are urged here and say that such a case is exceptional, how long a time would you give to the Delegate from Hawaii, who requires thirty days to go to his home and thirty days to return? How much time will you give to a Californian whose seat is questioned by the petition of a single citizen of his State? How long a time will you give him to take his evidence and prepare his case, when it takes him six or seven days to get to his home?

Will you adopt one rule for Maryland and Virginia, another for California, another for Missouri, another for the Hawaiian Islands? When we leave the strong, safe guide that the law establishes, we know not where we shall drift. Unless we take as our rule a full and fair time to prepare and hear the case we will have a shifting policy. It will be a rule of expediency and not a rule of fixed law to govern us. Under such a system, or rather no system, no member would feel safe during his term, and until time had sealed it there would be no security. I ask you to take this case to yourselves. The seat of any member may be questioned in like manner by a petition showing what is styled a prima facie case for the purpose of having a contest inaugurated. In my experience under the drastic provisions of the law abuses have arisen, but what will it be with the majority resolution as a precedent? Under the established law a contestant with but a thousand votes in a Philadelphia district, assuming probably that he had a prima facie case, pursued his contest and got his $2,000. Another from Louisiana, with a few hundred votes, tried to do so, and the next Congress is to be treated to the spectacle of a contestant from South Carolina with less than 200 votes trying to do so.

We are not without evidence as to the great importance of this contest and its great field of inquiry, with the vast number of witnesses—a question in which not only the State is interested, but the House and the contestant and contestee, but in which there are other interests. Why should we undertake to determine a case of this kind in an injudicial way without the safeguards ordinarily observed in order to insure fair consideration? Tell me why?

Mr. Butler was elected on the face of the returns in November, 1900. He acted as a member from March, 1901, and took his seat in December, 1901. He sat in this body for a year and three months—until June 27, 1902—to enable Elections Committee No. 1 to pass upon this great question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman pardon an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If the gentleman will be quick about it.

Mr. MANN. Why does the gentleman dwell upon the time spent by the Elections Committee No. 1 on this case, when he knows that the committee did not take up the question in this body until December?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But Mr. Butler was a member, and the election contest was filed.

Mr. MANN. But it was not pending before the committee.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It was pending seven months before the committee. I am making no criticism or aspersions, and I do not see why the gentleman should take up my time in this way, because I have perfect faith in him and the other members of his committee, as I have in all other members of the House. I am ready to concede that the Elections Committee No. 1, in accordance with its numerical style, "No. 1," is the best election committee in the House, composed of the best members, a committee that always performs its duty, working hard, and doing justice as it sees it.

But it took this committee seven long months with all its application to consider this case, and when they got through considering it, instead of seating the contestant, whose interests seem to be the special object of our solicitude and care, they refused to seat the contestant because there was a doubt on his side of the case as well as on the other. So I compliment the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I never have and I never shall in this House stand for irregularity and for fraud. I shall always stand for a fair determination of a case. We have not heretofore been surprised, nor will we hereafter be surprised, if irregularities and frauds do sometimes crop out in large cities the size of Philadelphia and St. Louis. It is incident to congested populations and the spirit in waging contests. It should be corrected, but I hope Congress never will go to the extent of denying fair and full consideration, for a judgment without a fair hearing never acted as a repressor. In the orderly procedure of the House in the care that it has for the sitting member's rights, as well as those of the contestant, I hope we will not carry to a hurried hearing and consideration the great questions here involved.

What are some of the questions involved in this case? Affidavits are presented with the petition to make a prima facie case. I will not be able to take them up in regular order or be able to refute them, except by evidence gathered from St. Louis in the greatest haste to meet the hurry imposed upon us, but I will tell the members of this House that the Twelfth Congressional district of Missouri, old and new, always was a Democratic district by from 2,500 to 3,000 majority until the questions of 1896 and 1898 changed it over, and in this last election, after the splendid Elections Committee No. 1 waiting seven months to consider this same case, which is on all fours with the one under consideration, giving their judgment sending both parties back to the people, the district voted, and when the election returns came in it was found that the supreme judge ran two or three thousand votes ahead of Mr. Butler, although Mr. Butler's majority is over 6,000.

Yet the regularity of Mr. Butler's vote is questioned, where it was less than the votes of other candidates. In apology to the House I will say that I can not present in regular order these various matters; they are presented now not on the merits, but to show the issues and to show the needs of evidence and time to meet them. I can show to the House some of the reasons why this contest can not best be determined in the time allotted by the manner proposed by the majority of the committee, and that the substitute resolution should be adopted. To the members of this House I exhibit some evidence why James J. Butler, after having been unseated last session, could go back to his people and return from that reliably Democratic district with a large majority.

In evidence of that I have copies of something like a dozen certificates, Republican, of nomination that were filed there. These cases must be inquired into in this contest. The Republican State committee ousted from office 20 out of 28 members of the Republican city central committee in St. Louis. Dissension and factional fights bristled all over the politics of St. Louis. The first petition that I present is a petition by Mr. Wagoner, contestant for the short term. That is one. Another petition is by Loffhagen for the long term, and another petition by Reynolds for the long term, and another petition by Reynolds for the short term.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman pardon me? He means that these are petitions in order to get their names on the ballots.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Petitions for nominations as Republican nominees. Here is a petition by the central committee to have Reynolds nominated for the short term—all matters of public record that we must go into. That is affirmative matter which Mr. Butler must file in his answer and about which he must take evidence, which in its character would be new to that taken in the old contest. Then the central committee filed another petition for nomination by Reynolds for the long term, all in the Twelfth district.

A regular convention was called, and that convention nominated Reynolds for the long term. Then another convention was called which nominated Reynolds for the short term. Remember, there had been a redistricting, and the districts were not the same. Neither Reynolds nor Wagoner are residents of either one of these districts; and while that is not material in their right to run, it may have some effect when it comes to the question of voters voting their choice. Then a regular minority convention nominated Wagoner for the short term and Loffhagen for the long term. Loffhagen then withdrew for the long term, and Reynolds withdrew for the short term.

Here again we have the record evidence under the law of Missouri that two separate committees were claiming to act as the Republican committee. Then here is a central committee nomination of Wagoner for the short term. Under those circumstances surely no one will claim that in a district which has been reliably Democratic for a long time, a Democrat would not have been elected. But we must prove it in this case, and it takes time to do these things. Mr. Speaker, I will ask to have read a newspaper article from the St. Louis Republic, a Democratic paper, always against Butler, which shows something of the situation which the contestee needs time to place in evidence.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLEAN HANDS NEEDED.

With all their fury of rhetoric about election laws the Republicans have failed to direct attention to the most flagrant violation of existing statutes that has occurred in recent years. Until Republican organs and politicians show that they have sincerity they are entitled to small consideration.

By the election laws of this State the Republican organization in St. Louis had absolute control of the fall primary. The city committee appointed the judges and clerks without interference from any source.

Party responsibility could go no further. Yet what was the practical result? The returns from the Third Ward were at the board of election commissioners an hour after the time for closing the polls. The vote was 932 to 62 in favor of the organization's candidate for city committeeman, showing that the officials in this ward hold the record for rapid counting.

In the second justice district Charles Boettger was counted out by a vote of 1,427 to 697. He instituted contest proceedings, and after a hearing in Judge Spencer's division of the circuit court a recount was ordered. It was found that about 800 more votes had been counted in two wards, the Seventh and Eighth, than had been cast, and that Boettger was entitled to the nomination by a majority of over a hundred.

These are only two of the worst cases of fraud which were practiced in the Republican primary. Only those who are familiar with the practices in that farcical proceeding can realize the extent of the underhand work which was done in electing a ticket favorable to the new city committee.

In view of those frauds what right has the Globe-Democrat to declare that "One of the first Republican reforms will be an honest vote for every citizen, without regard to his party and without asking him to consider honest elections a party favor?"

Until the Republican politicians can show clean hands there will be no public respect for those who prate of the robbery of the ballot. There may be faults in the present election law, but the people of this State and the members of the general assembly will not allow the men who displayed such crookedness in the primary and who are now preaching reform with such diligence to be labeled as patriots contending against a thieving majority.

IN THE THREE CITIES.

Sane Republicans in Missouri who hoped that the school fund settlement at the polls would relieve them of the incubus of lobster leadership are in a way to be disappointed. They are being forced into another two years of ridiculous party contortions before the State's voters. The election law issue is developing a lobster policy of making amendment of the law impossible and going into politics on villainous falsification of facts.

The Globe has constructed an elaborate table to show that the Republican vote fell away more noticeably in the three cities—St. Louis, Kansas City, and St. Joseph—than in the counties, and all on account of a statute.

Anybody would admit the fact, and anybody who reads about politics, even in the Globe, would have no trouble in assigning the cause where it belongs.

In St. Louis the rottenness of a Republican machine had caused the election of Democrats. Mayor Wells and Circuit Attorney Folk had splendidly justified the public verdict. Thousands of Republican voters in St. Louis voted the Democratic ticket this year in order to encourage good officials.

But that is not all. The Republican organization was more thoroughly disorganized than it has been since the war. The Globe had participated in a fight which defeated the old city committee. The old crowd controlled most of the established machinery. Impotence in getting out the vote succeeded. This was evident in the absolute absence of effort to register party voters. A great part of the old crowd joined hands with the Butler element and followed Jim Butler's orders. Democrats can not well boast of that coalition, but, at least, neither the election law nor a State board could be held to account for the indifference and treachery of Republican machine workers.

In Kansas City a somewhat similar condition operated. Kerens had been rebuked. His ambition to secure the minority nomination for United States Senator had been stricken by the Jackson County instruction for Warner. The Kerens crowd, headed by Dickey, were "sore" and not inclined to glorify their rival spoils hunters. There was no semblance of a vigorous Republican campaign in Kansas City, while the Democrats were better united and more aggressive in campaign work than they had been for years.

St. Joseph presented a case not essentially different, though the sides were reversed. The Kerens fusion with the Public Ownership leaders was carried out there, though it fell to pieces in the other two cities. The public Ownership vote did not materialize—the voters refusing to be delivered like cattle to Kerens—and the majority of St. Joseph Akins men, or Silk Stockings, either quietly voted the Democratic ticket or did not vote at all.

The Globe and Republicans who read the Globe are familiar with these facts, for the Globe was in the fights and told about them. The fight for Akins being one of the few praiseworthy acts of the Globe, it should not now pretend that there was no fight.

The Republican party in the three cities can fully understand the drop in its vote without charging results to an election law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, Mr. Speaker, this shows that there is no politics in it, surely, but that we ask only a fair consideration of this case.

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Surely.

Mr. OLMSTED. While he seems to be going somewhat into the merits of the contest rather than the merits of this resolution, and has read from the leading Democratic paper, I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that that Democratic paper holds and maintains and has published numerous articles to show that the sitting member here [Mr. Butler] was not honestly elected.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman states it correctly, but this is not a statement to go into the merits of the controversy. It is suggested to me by Mr. Butler that the paper has not made that statement of this contest, I would say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FEELY. If the gentleman will yield, I think I can answer the inquiry of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Like several other members of the House, I have been memoralized during the last two weeks by the paper to which he refers, and articles have been cut from the paper, marked with a blue pencil, and sent to me for consideration; and in none of the articles that I have received was there the information that Mr. Butler had not been honestly and fairly elected a member of Congress from Missouri. But I was memorialized as a Democratic member of the House, and requested to use certain criticisms and insinuations against the character of Mr. Butler as a motive in deciding my vote in this contest. I would say, in answer to the gentleman, that in none of these memorials or clippings was the statement vouchsafed that Mr. Butler had not been honestly and fairly elected on the returns.

Mr. JOY. What paper is that?

Mr. FEELY. The St. Louis Republic.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to correct my former answer. The fact is that in no instance that I know of has this paper said that Butler was not elected this time. These matters are simply shown to give the members of the House a fair view of the conditions that prevail, that must be ascertained by the evidence to warrant fair consideration.

The municipal ownership party in the large cities of Missouri desired a fusion with the Republican party. This was largely favored by the rank and file and opposed by the others. It caused a split in the Republican party in the large cities. It affected not only this district and caused it to have a large Democratic tendency, but it affected the districts of distinguished gentlemen from St. Louis who are now sitting upon the floor of the House, and throughout the cities of Missouri it had the same effect.

It is said by some, and not without show of reason, that the purpose of this contest is to secure an inspection of the ballots in the contest that can not be secured in a contest of a State or county officer; and on that inspection, by the law, where the voter is numbered on the polling book and the ballot is numbered to correspond, under this kind of an investigation it can be known who are traitors to the Republican party as it was known and published once before. Now, on page 41 of the report of the Election Committee in the last contest, we find this statement:

3. Discrepancy between testimony of witnesses and their ballots when examined.—Of the witnesses examined, 479 were asked how they voted on candidates for Congress. Of these, 120 testified that they had voted for Butler, 268 that they had voted for Horton, and most of the remaining refused to say for whom they had voted.

An effort was made to learn from the ballots how these persons appeared to have voted. It was disclosed that 113 were counted for Butler. Of the 268 who testified as voting for Horton the ballots show only 5 to be for Horton. The remainder were missing, or rejected, or had both names, or were marked for the third party candidate. On 54 of them Horton's name was scratched and no one was voted for for Congress.

What a splendid wedge to put in among these discordant, dissenting elements in St. Louis.

But these facts must be elaborated in evidence, and it took 2,200 pages of evidence to do it in the former case on the part of contestant alone. In addition to that we have the question of nomination in this contest. Unwisely, I think, there was no evidence taken by Mr. Butler before.

Now let us get down to some of the grounds of the contest, as shown by the petition presented which incorporates the notice of contest.

First. Because, although according to the abstract of votes forwarded to the secretary of state and proclaimed by the board of election commissioners of the city of St. Louis, Mo., there appears a prima facie majority of 6,294 votes in your favor, yet, when all the legal votes cast for me at said election shall have been properly counted, and all the illegal votes cast for you, and all the false, fraudulent, irregular, and illegal ballots heretofore counted for you shall have been rejected, and only those ballots which were cast in said election for said office by persons duly and legally qualified as electors are counted, it will appear that the undersigned contestant was legally elected to said office of Representative in Congress by a large majority of all votes legally cast for said office in said district at said election.

Second. Because the judges of election in many precincts of said district rejected legal and proper ballots proffered by duly qualified voters and placed them in the "rejected-ballot" envelopes and returned them to the board of election commissioners of the city of St. Louis, the acting returning and canvassing board of election commissioners in said district, and, further, refused to permit at least 500 legal voters of said city and district on said day, and who appeared at their proper polling places to vote for the undersigned, from casting votes at such election.

Third. Because a large number, to wit, over 10,000 illegal ballots were received and counted by the judges of election at said election, which ballots were cast for you by parties not entitled to vote at said election, for the reason that they were not residents of said district or the precinct in which they voted, or they assumed the names of voters who were dead or had removed, or the place where they purported to live were vacant lots. The parties so voting were not legally registered voters and entitled to vote at said election.

Fourth. Because a large number, to wit, 2,000 duly qualified voters living in said district who had theretofore been duly registered, were wrongfully and illegally stricken from the registration lists, and although they appeared at their proper precincts on said election day and proffered their votes for contestant for said office, their votes were refused and said voters were illegally deprived of their right to cast their votes.

Fifth. Because in each of the precincts of the wards composing said district, a large number of ballots, exceeding 100 in each precinct, were counted and returned for you by the judges of election, which ballots appeared from their numbers to have been the ballots of persons whose names were on the poll books, when in truth and in fact the names on said poll books whose numbers corresponded to the number of said ballots were the names of persons who did not appear at said polls on said day, being either dead or myths, or persons who had never lived in said ward or district, or had removed from said ward, and were for these and other reasons not entitled to vote, and whose names were voted upon by individuals unknown to me, and commonly called repeaters.

Sixth. Because the judges and clerks at many of the precincts did not correctly count the legal ballots, but counted in your favor and for you a total of 10,000 or more votes which were and are fraudulent and illegal.

That is a pretty wide range for this committee to determine and for the House to consider in the time that this committee limits. Then there are enumerations of 150 illegal votes in one precinct, 400 in another, and so on, giving a great many.

Seventh. Because in the first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, and ninth precincts of the Fourth ward, and a number of others, the clerks of election, officiating at the polling places of said precincts, were in a combination and a conspiracy, the purpose of which was to make the returns of election in said precinct to show large majorities in your favor, and not only permitted repeaters and fraudulent voters to cast fraudulent ballots, but did make wholly false and fictitious returns.

Eighth. Because in the precints and wards mentioned in the paragraph last preceding large numbers of fraudulent ballots were placed in the boxes which were not even cast by persons claiming to be voters; that in the first precinct of the Twenty-second ward there were 395 votes counted by you and 8 for contestant, making a total of 404 votes, while, as a matter of fact, the total registered vote in said precinct was 208.

Now, my friends, this is matter presented as showing a prima facie case, and it is presented on the affidavit of a citizen, and another affidavit as to another precinct is made, and yet the true record shows that there were 459 registered voters in precinct 7 of the Twenty-second Ward, while this affidavit alleges that there were only 208 voters in it registered. In the two instances where the affidavits are presented the statements are false. In his affidavit this same citizen swears that there were but 169 persons duly registered in precinct 7, Ward 4, but the record shows a total registration of 670.

Ninth. Because of the returns of said election in most if not all of the voting precincts of the Fourth and Fifth wards, etc., are untrue and entirely false and that the returns therefrom should be rejected altogether.

Tenth. That persons whose names are to the contestant unknown entered into a combination and a conspiracy to place upon the registration list of voters the names of many unqualified persons, and that in pursuance of said conspiracy a large number of claims, to wit, not less than 10,000—

Butler's vote was 16,844, the contestant's 10,551.

That said names were wrongfully permitted to remain upon said books by the judges and clerks of the respective precincts in said district; that many of said judges and clerks were participants in the said unlawful combination and conspiracy.

Certainly this is a sweeping declaration that will require the calling of the Republican clerks and judges all along the line.

That according to the best information of the contestant the whole number of fraudulent and illegal votes cast is at least 10,000 votes.

Then he ends with the eleventh specification, the Nesbit election laws of Missouri.

The authority, the case of Benoit v. Boatner, is offered as justifying the action of the House. In that case the evidence had all been taken, ample opportunity had been given, and by the unanimous consent of the House, the consent of the contestee included, they waived the time of presenting briefs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the resolution I offered provides, as was provided by the Committee on Elections, of which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] was chairman, in the Fifty-first Congress, in the case of Clayton v. Breckinridge (Arkansas), twelve years ago, that a committee be appointed, composed of five members of Election Committee No. 2, whereby this taking of the testimony and the consideration of the contest will be facilitated.

In that way the majority of the committee will hear the evidence of the witnesses in the first instance, will exclude irrelevant evidence, and then the committee, returning to this city, by a fair presentation by argument can report to the House, and the House can determine fully and judicially this contest within the life of this Congress. That is the precedent set in this House. It is wise in the House to follow it. If this House means to break down the law in this special case and not afford the best means for a full hearing and determination, you open a floodgate which may come back to plague you in the future.

I think it is an unwise precedent to establish. I think it is not fair to the State of Missouri, it is not fair to the membership of this House; and the rights of the contestant are not superior to the rights of the House. It is impossible to secure the evidence and present the case to the committee or to the House in the fashion molded by the resolution of the majority of the committee. By the committee hearing the evidence saves the time for its consideration after it reaches here, and the evidence can be printed with expedition and be given to the other members of the House for inspection, and that time would be saved. This is in the interest of due consideration.

Is there a lawyer in the House who will say—will the majority of the committee say—that this method is not better than to take this mass of testimony by notaries? Mr. BUTLER authorizes me to say that he would be content with the determination of this case in the way that the substitute resolution provides. It is the best way it can be determined, as members of the House should determine an election contest. Without this, we are breaking away from a fixed system and not doing the best that we can do to secure fair consideration of this election contest.

I think there is no prima facie case presented on the petition that will commend the majority resolution or that will appeal to the judgment of the lawyers of the House who know the great difficulty that surrounds the taking of this evidence in the limited time. Mr. BUTLER may well welcome this contest and the hearing of it, whether as a sitting member or as a Democrat from Missouri, from a political standpoint; but I again want to show my confidence in the members of Elections Committee No. 2 when I say that I have perfect faith in the fairness of their final determination of the case, but with an equally fair judgment I say that they can not best determine this case in the manner they have prescribed. It is due to the House, it is due to Missouri, it is due to the sitting member to sacrifice the contestant, if need be, in the interest of the integrity and dignity of these House proceedings. With this, Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman on the other side to occupy such time as he may desire. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. PAYNE). The gentleman has seventy-one minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, as a Representative here from the city of St. Louis, and as a quasi witness of the crimes against the ballot which are alleged to have been committed in the Twelfth district of Missouri, I am perhaps expected to tell the House and the country all I know about it. I am aware that my constituents and all the citizens of St. Louis and Missouri, irrespective of party affiliations, who are interested in honest elections, expect me here and now to speak out in open denunciation of Nesbit law elections at St. Louis; but I understand that this is not the question now. This is not the time to try the case; the question is whether the case shall be tried at all. In accordance with the rules of procedure, I shall therefore confine myself to the question at issue.

The gentlemen who preceded me on this side of the House have left no doubt on this question. It is perfectly plain that a vote against the pending resolution will mean an absolute denial of the right of contest in this case—in other words, a denial of justice—and it will mean more.

Mr. FEELY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Just one minute; I would like to finish this sentence. It will mean more; it means the abandonment of the constitutional right of the House to judge of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members. Now I will listen to the gentleman.

Mr. FEELY. I would like to ask the gentleman if there is not at least a relative possibility of determining this question by the adoption of the substitute resolution presented by the gentleman from Indiana? The gentleman from Missouri stated that a vote against the resolution would mean a denial of the right of contest. I submit to him that if the resolution presented by the gentleman from Indiana is adopted, would it not at least relatively result in getting at the truth of the matter in the contest here?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman had carefully listened to the statement of the distinguished chairman of this committee, he would have understood the reason why this could not be done. If we allow testimony to be taken under the resolution as it now reads, and as it is presented by the majority of the committee, testimony can be taken in five, six, seven, eight, or ten different places at the same time; consequently, it is contended, and I think justly contended, that if that can be done the case can be finished in fifteen days, the time allotted the contestant. But if we send a committee to St. Louis to investigate these alleged crimes against the ballot, testimony can only be taken in one place at one time, and therefore it would be impossible to complete the contest and have the House decide it before the final adjournment of this Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I insist that the pending resolution should be passed for two reasons. First, that a simple act of justice may be done; and secondly, that the House may protect its own integrity. I do not speak as a partisan; in fact, the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber are more interested in this case than we are, because the alleged crimes, if crimes they be, were committed in the name of the Democratic party. As far as the Republican majority is concerned, Mr. Speaker, they do not need an additional member on this floor. They do not care whether Mr. Smith or Mr. Jones is sent here to represent a district on this floor. But they are concerned, as I earnestly believe, in the question whether a man who occupies a seat on this floor has been honestly elected or not, whether the title deed which he presents here is a clean certificate of the popular will, or whether it is stained with fraud. On this proposition it seems to me our Democratic friends should occupy common ground with the Republicans, and it is the only proposition here involved.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. If the Republicans will occupy the ground of fair investigation with sufficient time to investigate the facts, and not cast odium upon the State without allowing fair opportunity for considering and investigating the conditions, the Democrats will stand with the Republicans always for a fair investigation. But if you propose to give only three days to file an answer to a blanket charge, like you have made here, and then only a few days in which to take testimony more comprehensive this time than before—when 2,000 pages of testimony were taken—then, no Democrat—and no Republican who wants fair play—can stand on any such proposition.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman is probably not aware that if his argument were correct, it would simply mean nonaction on the part of this House, and it would be a denial of justice.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is a denial of justice to set aside constituted authority in order to carry a point. You are attempting here to-day to set aside the law, to set aside established regulations and provisions, in order that you may hurry up this case without allowing proper time to take testimony.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Well, Mr. Speaker, I thought this matter had been settled; I thought the lawyers on this floor had agreed that it can be done and should be done.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Does the gentleman class himself and myself as lawyers?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I do not class myself as a lawyer, but I think I have studied law just as long as my friend, although I do not practice it. I may not have learned as much as my friend, but I have tried very hard to learn. [Laughter.]

A VOICE. You have learned enough.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In this matter it would appear you do not either practice it or adhere to it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If my friend will permit me to continue, I will do so; I have but a few words more to say.

All honest citizens of St. Louis, irrespective of party affiliations, appeal to this House to pass upon and decide this contest at this session. Since the supreme court of Missouri, by a formal decision, has sealed up the ballot boxes for all time to come, a contest is the only means to unearth fraud, and the House of Representatives is the only authority which can order the ballot boxes to be opened. The Democratic press, particularly the St. Louis Republic, extracts from which have been read on this floor, asserts that Republican as well as Democratic election officials were guilty of fraud. If this is so, Mr. Speaker, we want to know it. In a matter of this kind we do not want to draw the line between our opponents and members of our party family. We want to see all election frauds exposed, and we want to see the guilty ones punished, no matter whether they are Democrats or Republicans. And, in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I will say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to have a minute or two more.

Mr. MILLER. I yield the gentleman five minutes longer.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, in conclusion I will now go on record as saying, in behalf of the honor and integrity of this House, that if all the facts in this contest were known there would not be a dissenting vote on this floor upon the pending proposition.

Now, sir, since extracts have been read from a Democratic paper, which really were irrelevant so far as the immediate issue is concerned, I ask the privilege of having read an extract bearing on this case from a Republican paper, the greatest Republican newspaper of Missouri, possibly of the country—the St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

The Clerk read as follows.

CONGRESS AND THE NESBIT LAW.

No question of greater importance to this country could be brought forward than the fair election of the legislative branch of the Government. If the deliberate cheats in St. Louis who expressly contrived the Nesbit law to steal elections should be imitated in other States there would quickly be a swarm of bogus claimants trying to make the laws of the United States. The power to arrest such a flood of villainy and national disintegration is in Congress, and there rests the responsibility of vigorous, emphatic action in this weighty matter. The Constitution makes each House "the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." Congress became acquainted with the Nesbit law at the recent session. The sworn evidence of its many infamies was printed in three large volumes, embracing 2,214 pages. Jim Butler was unseated, and a hundredth part of the testimony, all reeking with the most defiant fraud, a fraud in which the partisan police department and the criminal class were partners, would have sufficed to send him home in disgrace. His claim to reelection rests upon the same robber law, the same corrupted agencies, the same hardened scoundrelism as before, the only difference being that the alleged plurality was shoveled up higher for effect in another contest.

Specific evidence of the grossest frauds in the Twelfth district in the election of last month will be laid before Congress without delay. Before examining this great mass of particular proof Congress should consider certain general features of the Nesbit law, any one of which would invalidate a certificate of election under its swindling and thievish operation. One of these features is the holding back of the printed registration lists in the Twelfth district until too late for verification. This scheme was practiced in the year 1900, and many pages of the printed volumes relating to the former Jim Butler contest are filled with testimony on this point. Two years ago the lists were withheld until a few hours before the polls opened. This year they were again kept back until the last moment, the excuse being that the printer was slow. The election law in force before the passage of the Nesbit law required the posting of registration lists in the precincts as fast as the names were put on the books. They were open for a long period to every investigator. But the Nesbit law concentrated the registration at one central office, cut out the continuous posting of lists, and made it practically impossible to inspect the lists at all.

Another portion of the evidence that Congress can examine at once is the reports of St. Louis grand juries. One of these juries, that of December, 1900, set forth the partnership between the partisan police department and the criminals of St. Louis. The jury traced a band of 50 or 60 repeaters from precinct to precinct and said in its report: "It is a significant fact that in one of these precincts a squad of police arrived almost simultaneously with this band of men and remained at the polling place for about half an hour, and accompanied them when they left." The jury said the frauds "must have emanated from a carefully planned purpose." The grand jury that reported last week pointed out that the Nesbit law offers no safeguard whatever against padded registration. Jim Butler could have had 15,000 plurality last month as easily as 6,000. He has in his possession two more certificates ground out by the Nesbit law fraud mill, unlimited. The whole business is a vile insult to Congress, as well as a dangerous assault on its honest membership. As Congress finds a second lesson necessary, let it act decisively.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I hope that gentlemen on the other side will now occupy some time. The chairman of our committee is not now on the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. We have occupied more time than the gentlemen on the other side; but I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that I believe this House has a right to take up and consider this election case irrespective of the provisions of the acts of Congress which usually govern the procedure in election contests. But if there ever was a case brought before this House which would justify adherence to the acts of Congress relative to this question, I believe such is the case before us to-day; and I wish to state the grounds upon which I base my belief.

First. This election contest seems to me rather a persecution than anything else. The result of the election was natural; any other would have been unexplainable and more than suspicious.

We must not forget, and it is not denied, that the man who presents this memorial—and it is a memorial signed not by people of the district, but by the single man who instituted the contest and presses it—comes from one who is not a resident of this district. Now, I admit that a district may have the right to choose a man from the outside to serve it in this body; but we all know that a man who runs under such conditions rarely receives the full, or nearly the full party vote in the district.

The preference always has been and the tide always has turned toward the man who is a resident there. The natural inference is that they were forced to seek a candidate outside because they had no one in their midst suitable and fit to fill the office; and pride gives, under such circumstances, many a vote to the home candidate which otherwise would be cast against him. But there are other reasons—one of them that the Republican primaries were so notoriously tainted with fraud that they could not agree upon a candidate. Not only were they so dishonest, but there was so much dissension and bitter antagonism among the Republican leaders and their active followers that only after a number of trials and repeated struggles candidates were chosen at all, and then they were chosen in such a manner that their nominations were discredited by their own party. What was the natural result of this? It certainly was not to increase the strength of the candidate chosen under such circumstances.

Then another fact which is notorious and which we must all hold in mind in taking up the consideration of this question—it is a fact published throughout the length and breadth of this land, of national public notoriety—the fact that previous to this election it was known to every citizen of St. Louis and of this country that there was a combination of legislative jobbers in the city of St. Louis by which legislation in its council was controlled and legislation in the State of Missouri was often controlled. Measures could only be passed by the payment of large sums of money, no matter of how trifling a character, often the mere permission to open a sewer in a street from a manufacturing plant. While there were a few Democrats in these frauds, the large majority of the jobbers were Republicans, and it is not denied that the city was controlled by the Republicans when the frauds were carried on.

The reflex of that could not be other than to give every Democratic candidate running in the city additional votes, and I have friends, as good men as ever served in this House, who suffered from these conditions so severely as to be defeated at the polls. I am satisfied they would have been elected if usual conditions had prevailed.

Mr. JOY. Will the gentleman pardon me for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. JOY. Does the gentleman know who was and is reputed to be the head of that municipal jobbery?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I do not.

Mr. JOY. I do not propose to mention his name myself, but I wish the gentleman had not touched upon the question.

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. I simply excused the nonelection of some of my friends and explained why the result in the case before us was natural.

Now, gentlemen, these are a few of many reasons which show why there is no merit, nay, even plausibility, in the contention of the man who files this memorial. Then we have another fact which is more convincing, and that is the fact that in this district the contestee had 6,293 majority out of a total vote cast of 23,395. Now, I say if there ever was a contest or a proposition of contest brought before this House in which it would be fair for this House to stand by its ordinary rules of procedure and close out this case, it is this one. The minority report, in speaking of this memorial, mildly states that in their opinion the contest is not frivolous and not without reasonable grounds. Such language damns the memorial with the faintest of faint praise. I do not believe in refusing to act.

I believe in fair and honest elections, and I believe that a man who strikes at the integrity of the ballot box strikes a blow at his country and its government. But I do say that these election contests ought to be carried on as serious affairs. As for myself, I have been on Election Committee No. 2, and I bear witness to the fact that those who are on the majority side of this House on that committee are the fairest men, and I believe they are as able lawyers as there are in the House. If I myself were interested in a contest, I do not know of any committee to which I would rather have that contest referred than to Elections Committee No. 2 as at present constructed, for I believe that there I would get a fair trial and a just verdict.

The conditions of this case are peculiar because there are not enough days between now and the time this Congress will be forced to adjourn to follow the rule laid down by the acts of assembly. Such being the case, I admit that it would be a denial of the constitutional right if this case could not be decided by the close of this Congress, but I do say that the committee should allow every latitude possible to both the contestant and the contestee, and especially the contestee, because he stands here as the attacked party, to have the evidence fairly taken and fairly presented, so that we may reach such a verdict as will be in accordance with the usual verdict reached by this committee—a fair one.

Now, the minority members do what? They present, I believe, the only practical way by which this case can be properly heard in the time at our disposal and justice done. In all my life I have never heard of such a nonsensical proposition, such an unfair proposition as that presented by the chairman and reiterated by the gentleman from St. Louis [Mr. BARTHOLDT], that the testimony could be taken fairly to these gentlemen in 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 50, or 100 or a thousand places at once. That is a proposition which shows on its face that the manner in which this testimony is to be taken will not be fair to the contestee or fair to the committee, so that it can arrive at a fair and righteous conclusion.

I do not not understand the contestant's case. He says he wants only fifteen days. I was for giving him more, and I do not believe he will get any case in unless it is the kind of a case that is based on glittering generalities, where the contestee will be forced to meet those glittering generalities by specific proof. If that is his game, if that is his proposition, every man must see very clearly that the man who will be injured by it will be the contestee.

Now, gentlemen, take this proposition. I believe that the laws now on the statute book say what should be the ordinary time in an ordinary case for a proper collection of evidence and a proper hearing of the case. I think this law was framed not all at once, but as an evolution from experience in many cases in this House, and I do not believe any man will deny that if there were time it would be proper to give every day of the time allowed by the statutes. We can not do that, and I claim that we should do the next best thing, which is to provide some means by which this testimony can be taken which will bring to this committee the gist of this case.

What is the usual way? When I was in the senate of Pennsylvania it became my fortune or misfortune to be obliged to sit on two election contests. In one case we were obliged to examine 8,000 witnesses and in the other we were obliged to examine some 4,000 witnesses. If we had gone over the testimony in the way that it is usually taken it would have taken us about three times as long to arrive at a conclusion as it did; but the committee went to the place to save the expense of bringing the witnesses to the capital, and they took this evidence in a very reasonable amount of time.

The contestant can not be hurt by the proposition of the minority here. The majority of the subcommittee will be from the majority side of this house, and if there is any attempt to string out the testimony, if there is any attempt to bring in irrelevant testimony, it can be promptly ruled out, and the testimony which will bear upon the case and nothing but that testimony will be taken, and the shortest practical day fixed to close. In view of the peculiar conditions I feel satisfied that the proposition in the substitute is fair to the contestant as well as to the contestee, as far as it can be made so. I do not believe anything short of the full time would be really fair to the contestee, but I admit that he can not have this. Therefore we ought to be as fair as possible to him. I believe the proposition of the substitute is the fairest one that can be made. I do not claim that the committee have undertaken to throttle this contestee by their action; but I do say that I think they should in all fairness agree to the proposition presented here by the minority as being the only fair proposition by which this House can be put into possession of the material and important facts in this case.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] to use some time. We have consumed all but about thirty minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, so far there have been two objections urged to the adoption of this resolution: First, that as long ago as 1851 Congress, by the enactment of a statute, waived its constitutional rights to consider a question which involved the question of the judging of the election, returns, and qualifications of its members.

The other objection is that the forty days allowed for taking evidence will not be sufficient. I understand from the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania who has just taken his seat [Mr. GREEN] that the first objection is already waived, and it is conceded that this House has to-day its constitutional right to pass this resolution. But it is claimed by my friend from Pennsylvania that forty days are not sufficient in which to take the testimony. How does he know that forty days are not sufficient time? If there has been no fraud, then forty days are more than sufficient. If there has been as much fraud as is claimed by the contestant, then certainly forty days will be sufficient.

But you will bear in mind, Mr. Speaker, that after this testimony is in it comes back to this committee from which this resolution originated, and it will then be for the committee to say whether there has been sufficient testimony taken by which the committee can reach an intelligent determination and conclusion. And it also remains for the House, after the report of the committee, to say whether the evidence has been sufficiently well taken and enough testimony has been taken to pass intelligently upon this case.

Now, for one I desire that this case shall be considered in a judicial manner. I have no desire to unseat the contestee here simply because he is not of the same political faith that I am. Neither have I any desire to seat the contestant because he entertains the same political views upon some subjects that I do. And I think it is conceded here that this committee from which this resolution originates is a committee that always has considered questions from a judicial point of view.

Now, one thing is perfectly evident, that forty days is a long time in which to take testimony, and a particularly long time if the parties can take testimony before more than one magistrate.

It must be recollected that it is for the committee to say, when that testimony is completed, whether sufficient testimony has been taken by which this House can fairly judge the question of the election of the sitting member. The amendment offered by my friend from Indiana is one that contemplates a special subcommittee of five, taken from the election committee to which this case has been referred: that that committee shall go to St. Louis and take testimony. I think the gentleman who represents the district in St. Louis has made answer to that amendment by showing that that would be entirely futile. More than that, I think the members of this committee would somewhat distrust themselves in attempting to take that trip to St. Louis, a most generous and hospitable city, to be entertained by the friends of both the contestant and the contestee. I doubt very much if they would ever accomplish their work; and I sometimes think that my friend from Indiana, when he proposed that amendment that the committee should travel to St. Louis and be entertained by the generous citizens of St. Louis, knew perfectly well that they never would complete the work.

However, this is not a case at this time to be discussed on its merits. It is simply a question whether this House shall pass upon the case. With this memorial before us, with all the charges of fraud made in that memorial and supported by all the affidavits annexed thereto, it is the duty, in my judgment, of this House to pass upon this election case. I believe we can pass upon it in a way that will be judicial in its character and in a manner, I trust, that will be satisfactory to both sides of this House. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me to be a very remarkable proposition that has been advanced by the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, that this House has not the power to enact or pass a resolution of this sort because of its coming in conflict with the statute. Why, Mr. Speaker, it has been the invariable practice of the Committees on Elections of the House to disregard the strict provisions of the statute in reference to the time of taking testimony in contested-election cases, and in my judgment more than one gentleman has been seated or remained in a seat on the other side of the aisle because the Committee on Elections has disregarded the technicality of the length of time prescribed by the statute. The purpose of the statute in fixing the time for taking testimony was to permit testimony to be taken before the session of Congress commenced. The election is held in November in one year, the session of Congress begins on the first Monday of the December of the following year, thirteen months after its election. The statute prescribes the method by which the testimony can be taken during that period when Congress itself can make no prescription, because not in session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, to say that the statute binds the House of Representatives is to place the provision of the statute against the Constitution. Here is a proposition which merely permits the facts to be presented to the House. In no other way can the House determine the contest or the right of the gentleman from Missouri to a seat on the floor. In no other way can this House intelligently pass upon the question. The Committee on Elections might take this memorial and bring in a report to unseat the sitting member without having a single particle of evidence before the committee. It has power to make a report of that kind—the House has the right to unseat the gentleman from Missouri without listening to any evidence at all—but I say that would be grossly unfair, and no person would be justified in making a report of that kind; and no House would be justified in adopting tactics of that sort, unless through the opposition of the gentlemen themselves it became impossible to take testimony.

Now, to those gentlemen on that side who say that this side does not want the facts in a contested-election case presented, I ask them, Do they wish to claim that one of their members can be seated by fraud in this House and maintain his seat without any chance to turn him out on account of fraud? Do they wish to take the position that if a man happens to be elected to the House, and his title is questioned, that there shall be no investigation of the facts in the case? I am surprised, astonished, and shocked that gentlemen on the other side of the aisle should object to the taking of testimony in a case where fraud is charged against one of their members. They ought to be the first ones—the gentlemen from Missouri, all of them, ought to be in favor of a fair resolution for taking testimony.

Mr. VANDIVER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. VANDIVER. I will ask the gentleman to give us the name of anyone who has objected to the taking of testimony. The gentleman has so stated, and I would be glad if he will state in his speech who it was.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit me, the distinguished leader whom he properly follows in this House made the claim that this House had no power to pass a resolution of this sort.

Mr. VANDIVER. Is that objecting to taking testimony?

Mr. MANN. That is objecting to taking testimony, because the gentleman knows as well as any other that there is no way under the law to complete the taking of the testimony until the power of this House has passed away by its dissolution. Perhaps the gentleman will be satisfied if testimony can be taken too late to be considered. Perhaps the gentleman would like to have testimony taken after the 4th of March, after this Congress has passed into history. I would prefer to have testimony taken which can be considered by the House. [Applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. I now yield five minutes to the genttleman from Missouri [Mr. JOY].

Mr. JOY. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to go into the questions involved in this case, except so far as to show the practicability of taking this testimony within the time provided for in the resolution. In the outset it is well to say that if the time is insufficient for making out a case by the contestant there will be no case here, so neither the Democrats nor the Republicans will have to worry about that.

The district in which this contest arises is a small, compact district in the center of the city of St. Louis, pretty nearly square, and 2½ miles would more than cover the whole extent of the district itself. It is not over 2½ miles long and not 2½ miles wide at its widest place. Any person can go from the center of the city, where the notaries and lawyers have their offices, the business part, to the farthest point in the district in twenty minutes by a street car. There is no difficulty in getting a witness to the place for taking testimony. Anyone can be brought in, if found in his place of business or at his home, within half an hour.

Now, as I have heard to-day (I have not read this memorial), and I understand that less than one-half of the precincts are challenged for irregularity in the contest, and inasmuch as only about 27,000 votes were cast in the whole district, I will state that one notary public in ten days can open and count every ballot of those charged to have been irregularly cast in all the precincts where fraud is alleged to have occurred.

I say that in earnestness, because in a former contest in the Fifty-third Congress, in which my own seat was contested, the contestant opened and counted every ballot in every precinct in the whole district, and there were within 200 of 30,000 ballots in the boxes. With one notary public taking testimony in one place, not only did he count every ballot cast—inspected every ballot—but took the testimony within his forty days and ten days additional of over 1,500 witnesses. Now, with two or three notaries, or half a dozen, which is thoroughly within the law, thoroughly within the recognized practice of these contests, there is no question in the world but that the testimony sought to be elicited can be taken, if the witnesses can be found within the jurisdiction, without any hardship upon anybody.

As to the merits of this controversy, I know nothing of my personal knowledge and have no interest except as a member of this Congress. My only interest goes to the question whether or not the Congress shall use what power it has to investigate an alleged fraud within one of the districts represented on the floor of this House.

I can not refrain, while disclaiming any intention to go into the facts of the case, from having knowledge of one fact, and only one. It is rather amusing to me, because it is brought pretty close home. Within the district represented by my colleague [Mr. Butler] there is a number, 1507 Chestnut street, occupied by a cheap boarding house, as I am told. It was formerly the residence of ex-Governor Charles P. Johnson, but is now inhabited by colored people altogether, and is a 25-cent lodging place. At that number, at that house, according to the registration published, is the name of Charles F. Joy, registered in full. I am informed that on the tally sheet that name—my name—was voted at that number on the 4th day of November last. That is the simple fact. That little fraud, if it is a fraud, can be shown in five minutes before a notary public, and any one of the other thousands can be shown as quickly by testimony as available as in this case.

Now, as I say, 30,000 votes were counted by opening the ballot boxes in 1892 by one notary, and 1,500 witnesses were examined before the same notary. If the House fails to get the testimony before it which will justify a consideration by the committee or by the House of this contest, no harm can be done to anyone, and the little expense and trouble to which the contestant and contestee will be put will be justified by the act of the Congress itself in allowing itself to purge its own membership and investigate any fraud that may have been practiced in the election of any of its members.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I trust this resolution will pass. It will practically be absolutely impossible for a committee of this House to give the necessary time; and if they had the time, it would be practically impossible for them to reach the facts with reference to the conditions in the Twelfth district of Missouri. The district, while compact, is composed of a shifting population. If the frauds alleged to have been committed, the registration alleged to have been fraudulently had, did really occur, a committee would never find the thousands who are supposed to have illegally registered. In no way could the facts of that matter be reached except by personal investigation, and then testimony taken before notaries public to any number that may be necessary. Therefore I say, if we as a body, if the House of Representatives of the Fifty-seventh Congress, intends to look into this matter at all, let us look into it in a way that is practicable and reasonable and fair to all parties concerned.

Mr. OLMSTED. I will ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] now to consume the balance of his time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield seven or eight minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FEELY].

Mr. FEELY. Mr. Speaker, I am an optimist. Within the short term of my life I have looked to the millennium. I have looked to the day when the decalogue will be absolete on account of its uselessness. I have looked to the day when the criminal code will be repealed on account of its uselessness, and until a few moments ago I had always looked to the possibility of hearing my distinguished friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN] discuss a political question with judicial tranquillity.

I had not expected a blanket indictment against the Democratic party on account of the raising of a question of consideration which mainly dealt with a method of procedure. I am broad enough to believe, and my duty and my conscience direct me to believe, that this House at this short session of the Fifty-seventh Congress should determine the contested-election case of Wagoner v. Butler, if a prima facie case is presented.

For my part, I disclaim standing technically upon the statute of 1851, but I am not unmindful of the fact that this House and the Senate have a right to change the act of 1851 in a regular way, and the leader of the minority needs no defense in making the point of order which he did this morning. He was pursuing the regular parliamentary method and asking the House to stand by its established rules, so many times eulogized by members on the other side of the House.

It is a great privilege which I enjoy to occupy a seat on the Committee on Elections No. 2. During the period of my service on that committee I have seen all questions proceeded with in a spirit of judicial fairness, with a desire to give the widest latitude of procedure—always aiming at the substance of rectitude.

In this case I have no complaint to make against the majority of that committee, because I believe that, differing from the minority on the question of method, they are going about this question to determine it in a judicial manner. I believe the authorities warrant a determination of this question; and the broadest authority that is submitted to us is that of McCrary on Elections, in which various reports of committees of this House are quoted. That authority states that wherever, in an extraordinary case, a prima facie case is made out the House should depart from the statutory proceeding. The question that remains to be decided here to-day is, first, whether we have a prima facie case; and second, whether we ought to adopt the suggestion contained in the resolution of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], to send a committee to the scene of this election, instead of leaving the matter to the usual and often haphazard method of taking testimony simultaneously at different parts of a city or district.

The attention of the House is first called to this case by a memorial presented upon the request of the contestant. I will not go over the various grounds submitted here in support of that memorial, because it is not contended as to many of these grounds that they were relied upon seriously. The gentleman from Indiana went over sufficient of these charges to demonstrate that at least in the form submitted to us they are frivolous. My attention was particularly called to one frivolous charge contained in the notice of contest and also in the memorial to the House—that is, the charge of conspiracy. I quote from the grounds of contest set up in the notice, where the contestant says:

10. That, at some time prior to the registration of voters held for the purpose of said election, a number of persons, whose names are to the contestant unknown, entered into a combination and conspiracy, the purpose of which was to cause to be placed upon the registration lists of voters in the said city of St. Louis, in the said district, as legal voters the names of many unqualified persons.

I will not read further. It is sufficient to say that this whole charge is of the blankest character, analogous to the declaration filed by a young lawyer who expected to recover about $400, but who laid the damages at $347,599. I say that when this House is called upon to determine a contest in such a short time and to depart from the usual method of procedure in so determining it, there ought to be the most unstinted candor in the memorial sent up to the House of Representatives.

There ought to be some other memorial besides that of the contestant himself. There ought at least to be a petition of a respectable number of voters in the district; but, waiving that, the statement is made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT], in answer to a question, that it is much easier to take the testimony at different places, before notaries public or other commissioners, than it would be before a committee of this House. The lawyers of this House know, and the business men of this House are sure, that when you want to expedite matters, when you want to determine judicially the truth of a stated fact, you can do it far better before men who have the training to compel the adduction of testimony according to the established rules of evidence and procedure than you can before a justice of the peace or a notary public.

I have had a little experience in this House, going over tomes of testimony for the purpose of proving, perhaps, that some Senegambian handed out a few sheckels of denomination 25 or 50 cents for a vote on election day. I believe that a committee carrying with it the power and the prestige of this House going to the city of St. Louis with the intention to insert a probe into the alleged rotten conditions of that, perhaps, unfortunate city, could find more of the truth and arrive better at an issue in this contest than we can by delegating practically to the contestant the power of going before a notary public and bringing evidence to support all these allegations within a period of fifteen days.

Eager to get before the House, grasping at the opportunity to accept fifteen days, the contestant may possibly be under at least the shade of the inference of a lack of bona fides in this case. If we are to determine this case honestly, as we will upon our oaths when the report of this committee is made, we ought to have the broadest latitude in arriving at these facts, and this House, by the adoption to-day of the majority resolution, practically says to notaries public, as suggested by the gentleman from Missouri, "Issue your subpœnas; hold your court in any barn, anywhere; compel the contestee to follow you, in order that he may cross-examine your witnesses, and to determine the possibility of the impeachment of those witnesses."

Say to the Democratic side of this House, if you can, that your proposed method of taking testimony all over the district, all over the city of St. Louis, compelling the contestee to chase around after these notaries public, and in all this haste to prepare to follow his case, is as fair a one as that of a committee of this House, sitting in its dignity, accepting no testimony but that which is relevant to prove the issues in this case. The minority of this House, weighs its honor as heavily and as fairly as the other side. It desires not to have its honor tarnished by an irregular certificate of election. It desires fairness.

If there is a man is this House who is not here by the law of the land and the desires of the legal voters of his district, he ought to get out; but do not, in the haste to respond to a partisan memorial, close out the possibility of getting the fullest and fairest investigation here. Place it upon your own shoulders and anticipate your own serenity, my friends, if you were called upon to hie yourselves around after various notaries public, to find them in order that you may cross-examine the witnesses presented and to discover the antecedents of those witnesses and try your case in a judicial manner.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that I have offered, perhaps, the main suggestions which I intended to make here this morning. I recognize the fact that going into a long discussion of things not material here would do no good to the House, would do no good to the contestee, would do no good to the dignity of the House or to anyone considering the question; but I believe, in the first instance, in the integrity of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] in submitting this resolution for a committee of investigation. I believe also that if the majority of this House in its judgment or in its power sees fit to reject that resolution the very widest latitude should be offered to the contestant, whether he likes it or not; and here and now, going into the realm of anticipation, I would say to the members of this House that they should mark down on the tablets of their brains this statement, that the contestant came before the committee—and that is important to the House—and stated that fifteen days was all that he required.

Let us not, when we get the testimony as provided by the resolution, if the majority resolution passes, on February 1 forget that more days remained for the taking of testimony, and let not the inference be made at that time that if more time could be had greater proof of frauds or irregularity would have been obtained. I say, Mr. Speaker, that in extraordinary cases the House has the right to amend the rules of procedure of the act of 1851, but it ought to be done only on extraordinary occasions, such an occasion where at least a respectable and creditable memorial is presented to this House. I hope that the majority of this House, having it in their power judicially to determine, without regard to partisanship or personality, the issues in this case, will determine them in such a way as to redound to their honor, glory, and credit. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND].

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, the first question is as to the power of Congress to take the action suggested. If that question should be decided in favor of the exercise of that power, the next question would be as to the propriety of exercising it. If it were decided that a proper case has been presented for its exercise, the third proposition would be in regard to the manner of exercising it.

My time being short, I shall direct the remarks which I shall make to the third of these propositions. I shall take no time to discuss whether the House, in a short session, possesses the constitutional power to proceed in ways not marked out in the statute to ascertain who is elected to a seat here. If the House does decide that it possesses this power, if it decides to exercise it, then it becomes practical and important to determine aright the method of exercising it, which certainly ought to be to arrive as nearly as may be possible under all the circumstances at an honest and correct conclusion in regard to the merits of the case.

That suggests a consideration of the plan proposed by the majority and that offered by the minority of the committee, the question whether testimony shall be taken in the form of depositions, or whether a subcommittee of the Committee on Elections shall be empowered to go to St. Louis, examine witnesses, ascertain the facts in the case as far as possible, and report the facts and its conclusions to the House for such decision as the House may see proper to make. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, considering the limited time in which the investigation is to be made, that it is most likely that by sending a committee to St. Louis, clothed with power to make a full examination into the matters in controversy, the real facts can be ascertained and a correct conclusion arrived at.

Something has been suggested in the discussion about a disposition on the part of the Representatives from the State of Missouri to stifle investigation and shrink from a fair disclosure of facts. Gentlemen who take that view of the matter are entirely misinformed in regard to the facts, or they are indifferent in the conclusions which they draw and the suggestions which they make as to what the facts are. I take it that by the record of the past and the present, as well as by the conduct and bearing of the Representatives from Missouri on this side at this time, and in all times, it may be fairly assumed and reasonably concluded that we are about as anxious and about as willing as the average of the membership here that all questions of this kind be fairly investigated and honestly determined. That is simple justice to our membership in this House from the State of Missouri.

On the other hand, we do not belong to the class who take occasion, in season and out of season, to abuse the State and the institutions of the State. We do not belong to the band of busybodies, a large part of whose stock in trade consists in abuse and denunciation, in season and out of season, with cause or without cause, of those among whom they dwell, and of the laws of the great State from which we all hail.

It will be found, I think, Mr. Speaker, if a fair and impartial committee visit the city of St. Louis and fairly and impartially investigate this matter, that the proud State of Missouri has provided wise, broad, just laws for the conduct of elections; that in the main the officials appointed to administer those laws are men of reputation and standing in their several communities, St. Louis being no exception; and that, upon the whole, and upon the average, elections have been conducted in that State and in that city with as much regard for honesty and law and fairness and with as great a desire to get at the will of the electors as elsewhere in the Union. Much in this case, and all outside of it, injected through the perfunctory exertions of some gentlemen who desire to get in outside matter reflecting upon the people of the State and its institutions and laws, will be found, upon a fair investigation, to have very little, if any, foundation.

The election board of the city of St. Louis consists of three members appointed by the governor of the State. Two are Democrats and one is a Republican. I take it that no man will find upon investigation, and that no respectable man will take the responsibility of asserting, either upon investigation or without it, that any of these men are lacking in character or qualifications. No man who desires to be honest and fair will raise any question as to the party affiliation and party devotion of any of these men. The Republican member of that commission is an honorable and upright man of the city, a man who stands well, and deservedly so, in the councils of his party.

That the millennium has yet reached all the wards of St. Louis, not yet having arrived in other parts of the Union or of the world, it is not necessary to proclaim. But, upon the whole, that elections are conducted there as fairly—that the last one was conducted as fairly—as elections generally are conducted in great cities is not an extravagant assertion to make, nor a risky thing to predict, as something to be verified by the investigation of this committee, if sent to St. Louis.

One of the gentlemen voted for did not live in the district in which he stood as a candidate. However it may be in other parts of the Union, out in Missouri there is among the people a sentiment—or prejudice, if you please—that each district ought to be able somehow or other to find within its own borders some one for Representative in Congress. And there is, if you choose to call it, a prejudice, perhaps more correctly a sentiment, against electing in a particular district a gentleman who has kindly offered his services from some other adjacent, adjoining, or neighboring district.

The other candidate in the case lived in the district, was born in the district, was reared in the district, and in fact and in merit has a strong hold upon the voters of the district. I was told only a short time ago of a little instance indicating upon what a foundation and basis rests the strength this gentleman possesses among the plain people of his district.

Some time ago, some years ago, I believe, a man from a neighboring State came to St. Louis and was employed in the service of a street or other railway company. In a short time he sickened and soon died, in abject poverty. He left a widow and two little children desperately poor. Some of the neighbors started a subscription to raise money if possible to bury the dead husband and father so as to keep him from going to the potters' field. After a few dollars had been contributed it appears that a neighbor having the subscription paper in charge met an acquaintance of his to whom he presented the paper and related the circumstances in the case.

This gentleman furnished the money to procure the coffin and a decent suit of clothes for the corpse, hired a hearse to convey the casket to the railroad station, purchased a ticket for the corpse and tickets for the family to carry them to a distant State—the old home. For the widow and children he had a carriage ordered to convey them to the station, and he footed the whole bill, amounting to $150, for utter strangers—"Strangers in a strange land"—for the decent burial of a dead man whom he never knew in life, for the relief of a widow and orphans who never could help him. Thus were paid the expenses of conveying the humble dead, the mourning wife and the weeping children who accompanied their dead, to a distant State.

Not only that, but he gave the stricken ones money enough and to spare for their expenses during the trip, after supplying them with transportation. It is no wonder to me, Mr. Speaker, however it may seem to other gentlemen, that in a district made up very largely of laboring people, of poor people, the overwhelming majority of the qualified electors, exercising their suffrage, according to their own devices, according to their own free, unpurchased will, record their decision in favor of a man who can do such an act of charity, without the possibility or hope of reward or recognition. For this, I am told, is only one of his many such acts of charity and broad humanity.

I would like to see a subcommittee sent to the city of St. Louis to investigate this whole case fairly, and I expect that it would come back here then without any slander in its report or upon the tongues of any of its members for the good people of Missouri, without any low abuse of the Missouri laws, without any libels on the legislation of that grand State, and with the facts and conclusions upon which the man really elected—by a majority of the honest, legal voters of the district—might be permitted to retain his seat in this House. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty-seven minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. Has the gentleman from Indiana consumed his time?

The SPEAKER. He has two minutes remaining.

Mr. OLMSTED (to Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana). Do you care to use it?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I waive the two minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire at this time to take up the time of the House in discussing the question as to whether or not the laws of the State of Missouri have been violated by any portion of her people. I am not here for the purpose of casting any reflections upon the people of that great Commonwealth nor upon the people of the city of St. Louis. There is not any question at this time before the House of Representatives that would justify any member of this body in making an attack upon the people of St. Louis.

I have been somewhat surprised, and, I will admit, somewhat astonished at the remarks to which I have just listened, made by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND]. In my judgment this is no time to offer any funeral oration upon anyone who desires to have this body pass upon his right to a seat here. The contestee may be very charitable indeed, and may in the course of a lifetime have rendered aid to some family that was deserving of charity at his hands; but I am reminded at this hour that the record of this House shows that the gentleman has drawn from the Treasury of the United States in the neighborhood of about $10,000 that this House has decided by its vote he was not entitled to, and that amount of money might have been generously distributed to the people of St. Louis that needed charity at the hands of the contestee, who is now asking that he may be permitted to retain his seat in this House.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the only question at this time to be determined by the House is whether or not the Committee on Elections No. 2 has granted sufficient time to investigate and determine whether the contestant in this case, Mr. Wagoner, or the contestee, Mr. Butler, or either of them, have been legally elected by the people of their district. The rule that has been adopted, and has been followed for many years, except in extraordinary cases, the Committee on Elections deemed not at this time proper for determining this particular case, and for the reason that, if that rule was to be applied, this Congress would have passed away and no determination made as to whether the gentleman who now occupies the seat from the St. Louis district is entitled to it or not. The fact is admitted on the other side of the Chamber that this determination can not be had under the ordinary rules of the House. Every speaker that has spoken virtually has admitted that fact.

Now, then, they ask us to adopt a different method from that suggested by the majority of the Committee on Elections No. 2. They say if you send a committee from this House to the city of St. Louis, that that committee, clothed with the power that it will be clothed with, can easily determine and report to this House, so that all questions can be determined before adjournment of this Congress. I want to call the attention of gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to the fact that they know as well as we do that if a committee from this House was to go to St. Louis for the purpose of taking testimony in this case that the hospitality of the people of St. Louis tendered, as it would be to a committee of this kind, that that committee would be wined and dined during the most of the time from now until the close of this session of Congress, and they would not get back here to make a report until Congress had adjourned. [Laughter.] I want to say that I know something about the hospitality of the people in St. Louis. I know that our Democratic friends in that great city would not allow this committee to devote more time than was absolutely necessary to determine this case.

Now, I want to say, as far as the criminal laws of Missouri are concerned and the people who have violated them, I am willing to turn them over to the tender mercies of one of the ablest attorneys that this country has ever produced, the present efficient prosecuting attorney of St. Louis, who has shown the people of America that he has had the courage, under the most trying and unfavorable circumstances, to perform the duties of his high office, and I believe the members, upon this side of the Chamber at least, are willing to leave this question to the courts of the State of Missouri and the distinguished prosecuting officer, Mr. Folk, who has been so successful in securing the conviction of the men guilty of the open and notorious violation of the laws of that State. [Applause.]

I want to call the attention of the House to the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], who says that if a committee of this kind could be appointed and sent out there, there can be no question but that at some time in the future they will make a report to this House, after they have fully investigated and examined all the questions growing out of the contested case. I want to say that they will report at some time, I have no doubt, in the future, but not in time to permit this House to vote on the question as to whether the people of that great district shall be represented by a man who is their choice or whether it shall be represented by a gentleman that they claim has no right to a seat in this body.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I would suggest to the gentleman that the resolution provides that the report shall be made in time for the House to determine the question.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that the resolution does make that provision; but if that committee has not determined that they can in that time make such a report as in their judgment ought to be made to this House I imagine that they will be back here again asking for further time, that they may go on and on until too late for action before the close of this session, and that seems to be the desire of those opposed to the adoption of the report of your committee.

The gentleman from Indiana says that in extraordinary cases this kind of a rule might be adopted and ought to be. Now, I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that if there was ever an extraordinary case presented to the American Congress this is such a case. Who is the contestee here? He is the distinguished gentleman who on the first day of the meeting of the Fifty-seventh Congress stood up in this House and took the oath as a member of this body, and who, after he had occupied a seat here, enjoying the rights and privileges of a member for a year and three months, was determined by the House of Representatives to be not entitled to a seat here. What would make an extraordinary case, gentlemen of the House of Representatives, in which we might adopt a different rule from that laid down in the statute of 1851, if this is not such a case?

I want to suggest to the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber that the only question at this hour for members of the House to determine is whether or not we will permit the contestee to retain a seat in this body until the close of this session without, in a legal and orderly way, inquiring into his right to such seat, and this, too, in view of the very serious charges alleged by contestant in his notice of contest.

I repeat that this is a most extraordinary case; and it justifies an extraordinary remedy, or at least one different from the ordinary rule in contest cases, because under the regular rule justice could not be secured in this case.

I want to say to members, especially those on this side of the House, that if you adopt the proposition presented here by the minority of the Committee on Elections No. 2 you will adjourn this body at the end of the present session without any report of any kind in reference to this contest; while if you adopt the majority report you will at the beginning of February, or before the middle of that month, have a report—a report which in my judgment will justify the American Congress in determining whether either of these gentlemen is entitled to a seat in this body—whether there was a legal election in that district.

I do not think any person here cares very much about the question of the nomination of these two gentlemen. That is a question to be determined by the evidence here, it is true; but if what these gentlemen say is true—that this contestant is without claim to the seat by reason of the fact that he was never regularly nominated—I assume that the burden of proof is upon him to show that he was legally nominated as well as legally elected. He has said to the Committee on Elections that he can do this within fifteen days.

After having heard from the lips of the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] the splendid tribute to the political virtue possessed by the gentlemen composing Election Committee No. 2, I only wish to call your attention to the fact that that committee was so fair to the contestee that they changed the rule of the House so as to give him five days more than given to contestant to present his testimony in chief in this case.

There is no politics in this case, and there should be none in the discussion of it. The Republican members of the Committee on Elections desire that the case shall be heard at the first moment that it is possible to hear it. They have said that in their judgment fifteen days will be sufficient time for the contestant to present his case, he himself having said that he can do it in that time, and after that it is proposed to give twenty to the contestee to present his case, with five days additional for the presentation of evidence in rebuttal, and then the whole case can be presented to the full committee and to the judgment of this House. Gentlemen, if you want at this session to determine this question under the extraordinary circumstances prevailing in this particular case, I ask at your hands the adoption of the report of the Committee on Elections No. 2. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, but little remains to be said in this case. The ground upon which the minority at first proposed to contest this resolution, as indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], appears to have been wholly abandoned—I mean the contention that the House can not itself, by resolution, disregard the statute of 1851. The substitute resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] abandons that principle.

Our resolution provides a certain time in which testimony shall be taken. My friend from Indiana contends that the testimony could not be taken in that time and then proposes a remedy by which not nearly as much testimony could be taken in the same time as under our plan.

Now, what is the proposition here? It is that a subcommittee of five, upon which presumably both political parties shall be represented, shall go to St. Louis and take this testimony. What would be the result? Banqueting, revelry, enjoyment of the proverbial hospitality of St. Louis, and very little attention to business. When a committee or subcommittee goes out to take testimony, somebody makes an offer to submit certain evidence. One member of the committee thinks it relevant, another thinks it is not. Half the time of the committee is taken up in debating such questions and little progress is made, particularly where, as in this case, there would be great inducement upon one side to consume all the time possible. Then, again, no committee sent out by this House will sit continuously, and of course it could not sit in more than one place at the same time.

What does the act of 1851 provide? Why, Mr. Speaker, it provides that testimony may be taken in two or more places at the same time. That is the provision of the law. That is the provision which the substitute resolution is attempting to evade or escape.

"Persecution" this is called. My friend from Pennsylvania and my friend from Indiana claim that it is an outrage to take testimony in different places at the same time—a great wrong to the contestee. Well, the contestee has the same privilege. I call the attention of those gentlemen to the fact that this has been the custom for more than fifty years. In every election case that comes here testimony has been taken at different places at the same time. It is always done. That is not provided in our resolution. It is provided in the act of 1851. We do not touch it.

Now, just a few words more. My friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FEELY], members of the committee, and also the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND], have attempted to show that a prima facie case has not been made out by the contestant—that he has not shown that this is a contest in good faith. My learned and distinguished friend from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] stated some reasons why Mr. Butler must have been elected, and the contest should therefore be treated as frivolous. He mentioned his great popularity. Among other things he had on one occasion helped a poor family to bury its dead. That was praiseworthy, but is that a reason why several hundred dead men should be voted in his support, as charged in this contest? [Laughter.] Then his great popularity because of his connection with the street railway. Is that a reason why, as shown by the sworn statements of third persons, 110 persons were registered and voted as living at 3865 Boulevard avenue, which this affidavit shows is a mule stable belonging to a relative of the sitting member? Is his great popularity evidenced by the fact shown in this sworn statement that in one precinct he received 330 votes, although there were only 169 persons entitled to vote at all?

That is a very forcible and valuable method of showing popularity, if such methods are not to be investigated by this House. But that kind of popularity hardly excuses an investigation. The contestee [Mr. Butler] has already during this Congress drawn his salary and served as a member of this House one year and three months without any legal authority, as was decided by the House on the 28th of June last. Our friends on the other side ask that he be permitted to sit three months longer. That is the substance of their resolution, because to adopt their substitute means that this contest can not be heard. I am authorized by the committee to accept the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana extending the time for five days for filing the answer. But the substitute providing a subcommittee to go to St. Louis is so manifestly intended to prevent the decision of this case by this House that we oppose it as strongly as possible.

Now, Mr. Speaker, without consuming further time of the House, I demand the previous question upon the resolution and substitute and all other amendments to its final passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the previous question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. OLMSTED. To that amendment. Mr. Speaker, the committee authorizes me to state that we agree.

The question was taken, and the amendment agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the substitute.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana) there were—ayes 90, noes 99.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. OLMSTED, and the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. ROBINSON, will act as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 106, noes 126.

So the substitute was lost.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the original resolution.

Mr. OLMSTED. Upon that, Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 155, nays 118, answered "present" 10, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—155.

PRODUCTION AND CONSUMPTION OF COFFEE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read by the Clerk:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, relative to the proceedings of the International Congress for the Study of the Production and Consumption of Coffee, which, in pursuance of a resolution adopted by the Second International Conference of American States, was in session at the city of New York from October 1 to October 31, 1902, investigating the causes which are producing the crisis through which that industry is passing.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE, December 10, 1902.

The message and accompanying documents were ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

COMMITTEE RESIGNATIONS AND APPOINTMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communications; which were read by the Clerk:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 3, 1902.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I most respectfully tender to you my resignation as a member of the Committee on Irrigation of Arid Lands.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN J. JENKINS,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Wisconsin.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 3, 1902.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I most respectfully tender to you my resignation as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN J. JENKINS,
Member of Congress, Tenth District, Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this gentleman will be excused from service on these committees.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1, 1902.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby tender my resignation as a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures; also as a member of the Select Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions.

Very respectfully, yours,

E. J. HILL.

The SPEAKER. With the approval of the House, these resignations will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following:

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 11, 1902.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I most respectfully tender to you my resignation as member of the Committee on Elections No. 2.

Truly, yours, SAMUEL L. POWERS.

The SPEAKER. The House approving, this resignation will be accepted.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER also announced the following committee appointments; which were read by the Clerk:

In accordance with the law (28 Stat. L., p. 768) the Speaker announces the appointment of the following temporary Committee on Accounts: Mr. HILDEBRANDT of Ohio, Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia, and Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia.

Also the following committee assignments:

District of Columbia: Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts.

Coinage, Weights, and Measures: Mr. BRANDEGEE of Connecticut.

Select Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions: Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts.

Elections No. 2: Mr. DWIGHT of New York.

Expenditures in the War Department: Mr. BRANDEGEE of Connecticut.

Irrigation of Arid Lands: Mr. DWIGHT of New York.

Irrigation of Arid Lands: Mr. BRANDEGEE of Connecticut.

Committee on the Census: Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BOUTELL, for the remainder of this week, on account of sickness.

To Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

VERONA HARRIMAN.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Verona Harriman, Fifty-fifth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

THOMAS O'CONNOR.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. RIXEY, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Thomas O'Connor, Fifty-seventh Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

BAYOU VERMILION AND MERMENTAU RIVER, LOUISIANA.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. BURTON, the reference of House bills 15605 and 15606, providing respectively for the construction of a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion and the Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, was changed from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, it was in connection with these two bills, the reference of which has been changed, that I desire recognition. I do not want to consent by this action to the idea that jurisdiction ordinarily in cases of this kind is lodged with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but in this instance, this stream being now in process of improvement and being the subject of appropriation, I think it would be better that the subject of this bill should be considered by that committee.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the request just granted on the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] covered the two bills referred to by the gentleman.

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HONS. JOHN L. SHEPPARD AND REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House meet on Sunday, the 25th day of January, 1903, at 12 o'clock noon, for eulogies upon the life and character of Hons. JOHN L. SHEPPARD and REESE C. DE GRAFFENREID, deceased, late members of this House from the State of Texas.

The resolution was agreed to.

SAMUEL H. HARRISON.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I present two privileged reports from the Committee on Accounts.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 338.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay to the mother of Samuel H. Harrison, late an employee in the Clerk's office of the House, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation received by him at the time of his death, and a further sum not exceeding $250 on account of expenses of his last illness and burial.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL FOLDERS IN FOLDING ROOM OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BULL. Also the following:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution No. 341.

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and is hereby, authorized to employ eight additional folders in the folding room of the House, at a compensation at the rate of $75 each per month, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, during the present session of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 341, authorizing the employment of eight additional folders during the present session of Congress, have had the same under consideration and recommend its adoption.

This resolution is recommended by the Doorkeeper of the House and the superintendent of the folding room in the following communication, and as it is customary to make provision for eight additional folders during the short session of Congress your committee ask that the resolution be agreed to.

OFFICE OF DOORKEEPER,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., December 3, 1902.

Hon. MELVILLE BULL, M. C.,
Chairman of Committee on Accounts, House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I transmit herewith a letter from the foreman of the folding room, containing certain recommendations relative to additional folders in his department. I most heartily approve of these recommendations, and it is my earnest hope that these recommendations will meet with the approval of your honorable committee, and that the relief asked for will be granted.

Very truly, yours,

F. B. LYON,
Doorkeeper House of Representatives.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 3, 1902.

Hon. F. B. LYON,
Doorkeeper House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I respectfully request that an additional force of 8 folders be employed in the folding room during the present session of Congress, for reasons herein explained.

During the present year the work of this department has increased very much. Many thousands of new publications have been received, and many reports that in former years were complete in one or two volumes, are now issued in sets containing as many as 13 volumes. This not only means the folding of many thousands of books over and above the amounts formerly received, but it also means the tying and arranging of said volumes into sets, which is slow, laborious work, and must be done with much care. This work alone takes from our regular work of folding documents three or four men most of the time.

After the amount appropriated for the folding of speeches became exhausted we were compelled to put our regular force folding speeches, many thousands having been received after the said fund was exhausted—in fact, we were folding speeches up to October 30 of the present year. This delayed the folding of documents, so that at the present time we have a large amount of unfolded documents on hand, and it is for the folding of these documents and many more yet to be received that this extra force is requested, and I hope it will receive favorable consideration.

Respectfully,

J. MARTIN MCKAY,
Foreman Folding Room.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a report of leases of Government property—to the Committee on Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

A letter frem the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report relating to accommodations for the post-office building at Yonkers, N. Y.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Jacob A. Fite against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Union Calendar for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We should like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill is in the nature of an emergency appropriation, to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to stamp out the foot-and-mouth disease now prevalent in New England, and which threatens the great live-stock industry of the country. The regular Agricultural appropriation bill does not carry money enough to answer this purpose—not enough to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to slaughter these cattle, which is the only way in which the disease can be exterminated. The bill and report have been printed, as well as the hearings before the committee; and these several documents have been placed on the desks of members this morning.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to ask a question. Is this bill a legislative bill? Does it legislate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it does.

Mr. CANNON. It changes the existing law?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It does in this respect: It transfers a power which now resides with the Secretary of the Treasury to the Secretary of Agriculture—a power which was supposed to have been transferred when the Commissioner of Agriculture was made an executive officer; but through oversight certain powers which had been exercised by the Secretary of the Treasury and which it had been intended to transfer were overlooked.

Mr. Speaker, if anyone feels disposed to object, I hope the objection will be reserved until the report of the committee can be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. No one has yet objected within the knowledge of the Chair.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the report will be read.

The report of the Committee on Agriculture was read, as follows:

The Committee on Agriculture, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes, submit the following report:

The only object of the first section of this bill is to carry out the intention of Congress when it established the Department of Agriculture as a Department of the Government and gave it all the powers over this question of dealing with infectious diseases of cattle and other animals.

When the present Department of Agriculture was made a Cabinet position, it was intended to transfer all the powers then vested in the Commissioner of Agriculture to the Secretary of Agriculture, but it seems that at that time the power to make regulations governing the transportation of animals in interstate commerce lay in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury and not in the Commissioner of Agriculture.

This fact seems to have been overlooked when the act changing the title of the head of the Department of Agriculture from "Commissioner" to "Secretary" and making him a Cabinet officer was passed, and has since been absolutely ignored and lost sight of. And during the last past ten or twelve years the Secretary of Agriculture has made all rules and regulations and issued all certificates of inspection permitting the transportation of animals from infected regions, and the legality of this action has never been questioned until lately, when the question arose in a suit brought by a shipper of cattle from Texas against the State of Colorado.

This State had passed a law ordering all cattle brought within its borders or passing through it to be subjected to a State inspection and a charge of fees for said inspection and the attendant labor. The shipper refused to pay, was arrested, found guilty under the laws of Colorado, sentenced to six months' imprisonment and to pay a fine of two or three hundred dollars. He sued out a writ of error in the Supreme Court of the United States, from which court an opinion was handed down December 1, 1902. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the supreme court of Colorado on the ground that the act creating the Bureau of Animal Industry only went to the extent of providing for the suppression and extirpation of contagious diseases of animals and did not contemplate the issue of certificates by the Secretary of Agriculture (through the Bureau of Animal Industry), and pointing out the fact that the act making a Cabinet officer of the Secretary of Agriculture did not transfer to him the authority (which was then vested in the Secretary of the Treasury) to make rules and regulations regarding the inspection and transportation of animals for interstate commerce.

As stated above, this power has been exercised for the last past ten or twelve years by the Secretary of Agriculture, who has a force of competent men to carry on this work, while the Secretary of the Treasury has none. It is simply to carry out the evident intention of Congress that this section is inserted in this bill. It is known to all that a very serious outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease has lately occurred in two or three of the New England States.

Experience in dealing with this disease in the countries of Europe shows conclusively that there is but one way to thoroughly extirpate it, and that is by slaughter of every herd infected and every herd which has been exposed to the contagion, and the thorough disinfection of stables, cars, and premises of all kinds which may have been occupied by infected animals.

Your committee considers this outbreak of foot-and-mouth disease (which disease has practically never existed before in this country) the most serious menace to our live-stock interests, the vast magnitude of which will be appreciated when the attention of the House is called to the fact that last year live stock to the value of $46,000,000 and animal products to the value of almost $1,000,000,000 were exported from the United States.

Should any hesitancy be shown on our part in our efforts to stamp out this disease, Europe might make it a pretext to quarantine against our animals and animal products, and the loss to our agricultural industries by such action would be beyond calculation.

Your committee therefore urges upon the House the immediate passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MADDOX. I think the bill had better go over until to-morrow, so that we may have time to look into the matter.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

FIRST REGIMENT OHIO VOLUNTEER LIGHT INFANTRY.

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report upon the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Infantry. I ask that the statement of the House conferees be read in lieu of the report.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

This action places the proposed legislation as it passed the House June 20, 1902, and was approved by the Senate December 9, 1902.

ADIN B. CAPRON,
CHAS. DICK,
JAMES HAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CAPRON. I move that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SULLOWAY. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar under the rule.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. CAPRON in the chair.

CHARLES F. WOODFORD.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8663) to remove charge of desertion from the military record of Charles F. Woodford and grant him an honorable discharge.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the military record of Charles F. Woodford, late a private of Company I, One hundred and first Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, so as to remove the charge of desertion and grant him an honorable discharge.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Insert after the word "discharge," line 7:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

THOMAS CORDINGLY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 1634) to remove the charge of desertion against Thomas Cordingly.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now standing against the name of Thomas Cordingly, a seaman, charged with desertion from the United States steamship Flag and Vermont, April 27, 1865.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs was read, as follows:

Add after the word "five," in line 8:

"And the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to issue to him a certificate of honorable discharge from the Navy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN RICHARDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9879) for the relief of John Richards.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now appearing in the military record of John Richards, late of Company K, Sixteenth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the Army of the United States.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9879) to correct the military record of John Richards, late of Company K, Sixteenth Kentucky Infantry Volunteers, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment added to the end thereof:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

John Richards was enrolled January 1, 1862, and mustered into the service January 28, 1862, to serve three years. He enlisted as a veteran volunteer January 1, 1864, and continued in the service until February 2, 1865, serving in all over three years, when he was charged with having deserted. His service would have expired under last enlistment July 16, 1865, less than six months from expiration of said service.

The proof is strongly to the effect that he was a good and faithful soldier, and the hospital records show that he was sick, and the proof sustains the claim that he was sick at home from the time he is charged with having deserted until after the date of the muster out of his company and regiment. No bounty or other benefit accrued to him, and there was no incentive in his case to have deserted, and we are satisfied that the charge against him is a mistake.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOSEPH FIELDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9419) for the relief of Joseph Fields.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion now appearing in the military record of Joseph Fields, late of Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, and to issue to him an honorable discharge from the Army of the United States.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

This is a bill to grant to Joseph Fields, late a private in Company D, Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Infantry, an honorable discharge. The proof in the case is quite voluminous. The soldier bases his request for the relief asked on the claim that he was taken sick and sent home by his officer, and was not thereafter able for the performance of military duty during the time of his enlistment. He never received any benefit of any kind by remaining away from his company and regiment, and the proof is conclusive as to his inability to perform military duty during the period of his enlistment.

The amendment recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the bill:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN FLER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 4982) granting an increase of pension to John Fler.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John Fler, late musician, Twenty-seventh Regiment Michigan Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN A. ROTAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2409) granting an increase of pension to John A. Rotan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John A. Rotan, late of Company H, Forty-fourth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

GILBERT BARKALOW.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 5052) granting an increase of pension to Gilbert Barkalow.

The bill was read, as follows:

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make an inquiry here of the chairman of the Pensions Committee or the committee reporting this bill, who is, I believe, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY]. It seems that this is a special bill for an increase of pension, and there are a large number of such bills. It seems that about all of these bills are either to grant or increase the value of pensions. At the last session of Congress I asked the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. SULLOWAY] why there were so many of these special acts, and the gentleman from New Hampshire replied that it was because the parties did not get justice at the Pension Bureau, the real meaning of the remark being that the then Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. H. Clay Evans, was not dealing fairly with the proposed pensioners. In a few days after this inquiry Mr. Evans resigned.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have a new Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Ware, from the State of Kansas. I will ask the distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire why it is that we continue to have this flood of special acts, taking up the valuable time of Congress, when we have a new Commissioner and a huge Pension Bureau? We were given to understand that when the new Commissioner was appointed Congress would be relieved from doing the work of that Bureau. I will ask the gentleman from New Hampshire if the trouble still lies at the door of the Commissioner of Pensions?

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I heard much of what the gentleman stated. I was about to turn the matter over to the gentleman who reported this bill, but I thought I understood the gentleman from Tennessee to ask if there had been any change since the Commissioner of Pensions has been changed. That has nothing to do with these bills whatever. If that was his inquiry, I will say that all these matters were adjudicated before the present Commissioner came in.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I understand the gentleman to say that these are claims that were before the committee during the period covered by the old Commissioner, Mr. Evans, and that none of them are new; that is, that they have not been filed since Mr. Ware has been Commissioner of Pensions.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, let us have the report read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk proceeded to read the report, but was interrupted by—

Mr. SLAYDEN, who said: Mr. Chairman, so far as I am concerned, the reading of the report may be dispensed with.

Mr. BARTLETT. I desire to inquire whether under the rule bills of this character are in order for consideration to-day? This is a bill to remove the charge of desertion. I simply make that parliamentary inquiry of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule, as found on the first page of the Calendar, includes, as the Chair understands, as a part of the business of to-day, bills for the removal of the charge of desertion.

Mr. BARTLETT. It seems to me a little unusual, on pension day, to have bills of this character come up for consideration. No such rule appears on the Calendar I have before me.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon further examination, the Chair is of opinion that this bill can hardly be considered as one of those that may properly come up on this day. Therefore, with the concurrence of the House, the Chair will direct that the bill be passed over.

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no objection to the bill. We have put through others of this character to-day. I ask unanimous consent, if necessary, that the bill be considered.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands, the gentleman from Georgia withdraws his objection. Is there further objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I did not make any objection. I asked the Chair to rule; the Chair has ruled.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, upon hasty examination of the report, made a ruling which seemed at that time to be proper. But in questions of this kind many things are involved. There are many bills that may or may not be considered as involving the charge of desertion or the correction of a military record. The Chair has not examined this report carefully. If the gentleman makes objection——

Mr. ALEXANDER. There is no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be misunderstood as to my position. I simply inquired of the Chair not as to this bill particularly, but as to this character of bills, whether they could be considered this day under the rule. This is all. If the Chair rules they can, I have nothing further to say; if he rules they can not be, I have nothing further to say. Having made the request, if the House desires to proceed, very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to leave the matter in this way: This bill having proceeded thus far, if there is no objection to the present consideration of the bill, it will be considered; if there is objection, the Chair will rule that it shall not be taken up at this time. The Chair will ask if there is objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question, therefore, is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and the bill ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY COOK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 917) for the relief of Henry Cook.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Henry Cook, late of Company G, Thirty-fifth Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, and of Company C, Twentieth Regiment of New York Volunteer Cavalry, and to grant him an honorable discharge from the service first above named.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Insert, after the word "named," in line 9: "Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know the reason for the passage of this bill, and I would ask that the report be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 917) for the relief of Henry Cook, report the same back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass with the following amendment:

"Insert after the word 'named' in line 9: 'Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passsge of this act.'"

A similar bill was reported in the Fifty-sixth Congress by the Committee on Military Affairs, and a copy of that report is hereto attached and made a part hereof.

[House Report No. 1848, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 417) for the relief of Henry Cook, report the same back to the House with the following report:

Henry Cook was enrolled December 25, 1861, as a private in Company G, Thirty-fifth New York Volunteer Infantry, to serve two years. While in the service he suffered from chronic diarrhea and dyspepsia, and he was admitted to a hospital for treatment for dyspepsia October 5, 1862. He was, as appears from evidence presented to your committee, transferred to a hospital in New York City, from which hospital, according to his own statement and the records of the War Department, he was discharged December 30, 1862, although in poor health. The soldier states that he was given a discharge from the hospital and supposed that he was properly discharged from the service. He states that he was told upon leaving the hospital to go where he pleased. His home was in Theresa, Jefferson County, N. Y. He had relatives in Frankfort, N. Y., and on leaving New York City went to Frankfort, where he was obliged to remain on account of serve illness from his army trouble, chronic diarrhea and dyspepsia. He remained there for some time, unable to return to his command, had he understood that he was to do so.

In support of these facts there has been presented to the committee the evidence of Abbie A. Grants, whose home was in Frankfort, N. Y., and at whose home Cook stopped while in Frankfort. She testifies that Cook came there in a feeble and emaciated condition and suffering continually with dyspepsia and chronic diarrhea. She testifies that, as she understood, Cook came there from some hospital in New York.

Owing to his feeble condition, Abbie Grants states that Cook was obliged to remain in Frankfort for about two months, when, being somewhat improved in health, he went to his home in Theresa. She states that Cook thought he was discharged. He left in March, 1863.

The evidence of Abbie A. Grants is corroborated by that of Wilber M. Phillips, who was a soldier and a relative of said Abbie Grants. He states that while in the Army he was accustomed to hear from said Abbie Grants as frequently as once every week, and that in the early months of 1863 he received letters from her stating that Cook was at her home in a feeble condition, having come there from a hospital.

Claimant says he went from Frankfort to his home in Theresa in March, 1863, as stated by Abbie Grants. The evidence of six reputable persons—Mary McIntyre, John D. Williams, Arza Parker, Jason C. Dowers, David Cook, and Christopher McIntyre, all residents of Theresa, N. Y., in March, 1863—has been presented to the committee, and shows clearly that claimant reached Theresa in March, 1863, and that he was in a feeble and emaciated condition, and that he could not have returned to his command had it been his understanding that he should do so.

One of his comrades in Company G, Thirty-fifth New York Infantry, testifies that he went from Theresa, N. Y., and that his family were neighbors of the family of Henry Cook; that some time in March, 1863, he heard from his father that Henry Cook was at home and was in a feeble condition, being reduced almost to a skeleton.

On June 5, 1863, Cook's command was mustered out of service.

Newton McIntyre, above referred to, came home to Theresa and found Cook there and still in a feeble condition.

On August 4, 1863, Cook reenlisted in Company C, Twentieth New York Volunteer Cavalry. McIntyre also reenlisted in the same company. He states that neither he nor Cook was examined by the surgeon, although McIntyre states that the captain of the company told him repeatedly that Cook was unfit for service, but being desirous of raising a company he had taken him.

In Company C, Twentieth New York Cavalry, Cook served faithfully until July 31, 1865, when the command was mustered out.

It clearly appears from the evidence that this soldier went home from the hospital in bad health and utterly unable to return to service, had he supposed he should have done so, which he did not. His ill health is shown to have continued until after the muster out of his command. He reenlisted and served faithfully for two years.

In view of the facts above stated, and supported by competent evidence, it appears that the soldier had no intention of deserting; that had he known he should return to his command he could not have done so on account of disability incurred in the service; that his good intentions are clearly shown by subsequent long and faithful service.

Your committee believes that Henry Cook is entitled to an honorable discharge and recommends that the bill for his relief do pass with the following amendment:

"Provided, That no pay, bounty, or other emoluments shall become due or payable by virtue of the passage of this act."

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, there appears to be no statement from the office of the Record and Pension Bureau with reference to this case, only statements and hearsay evidence on the part of certain friends and relatives of the claimant. The author of this report [Mr. ESCH] is not present. Without his presence and his ability to explain it upon reasonable grounds, I am constrained to believe that the bill should not pass. I shall interpose an objection to its passage at this time. I am willing to have the bill go over without prejudice for further consideration of the House, when Mr. ESCH can be present and explain it, and I would therefore ask unanimous consent that it be so passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the bill under consideration be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANCIS M. OLIVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5028) for the relief of Francis M. Oliver.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion against the record of Francis M. Oliver, late private in Company E, Thirty-third Regiment of Indiana Volunteer Infantry, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of the date of the muster out of said regiment.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, the report of the Chief of the Record and Pension Office shows conclusively, to my mind, that this bill should not pass. I do not like to appear captious in this matter, but this thing of falsifying the records of the War Department in order to give a pensionable status to a man who has not earned that high privilege and honor by service in the Army ought to be stopped some time. It seems to me that this is a very good case on which to begin the good work of preventing that sort of invasion of the Treasury through the falsification of records. General Ainsworth states in his report that the application for the removal of the charge of desertion and for honorable discharge in the case of this soldier has been denied by the War Department, and now stands denied on the ground that he did not serve until May, 1865, and that it has not been established that he was prevented from completing his term of service by disability incurred in the line of duty, etc.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest that the bill is not in order at this time, in any event, it being a case for the removal of a charge of desertion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would ask for information as to the parliamentary status of this bill. Is it properly up for consideration on this Calendar to-day?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the rule under which we are proceeding to-day is that the bill before the committee at this time is clearly within the provisions of that rule. To remove the charge of desertion is one of the items specifically recognized as proper under the rules for this day's procedure.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The charge of desertion, then, is necessarily incident to the enactment of pension legislation, so far as it applies to deserters?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would not like to have what he stated so interpreted.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would like to say a word in explanation of this bill. I am personally familiar with the facts of this case. I have examined the record carefully. The proof shows that this soldier deserted at the time he was insane; at a time when he was incapable of committing the crime of desertion or any other crime. He was committed to an insane asylum and died a lunatic. This application is made on behalf of his widow, who feels very deeply the stain upon the family growing out of the records showing that he was a deserter. His case was rejected by the War Department because he did not serve until May, 1865. He had deserted and left his command at an earlier date. There is no evidence that he became insane in the line of his duty, but the evidence is overwhelming that he was insane at the time he left his command, that he had been most of the time either in the poorhouse or in the insane asylum. In his condition he could not be convicted of this crime of desertion or any other crime on this evidence. The bill was introduced on the theory that he was incapable of committing the crime of desertion.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman indicate where in this report there is any evidence that he was insane at the time of the desertion?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. Oh, yes; I can call attention to it very readily.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Have you the same report in your hand that I have?

Mr. HOLLIDAY. I have the report in the case, if you will permit me to read a brief extract from it.

STATE OF INDIANA, Vigo County, ss:

I, F. M. Dunkin, on oath say that I served three years a private in Company E, Thirty-third Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, during the war of the rebellion.

Francis M. Oliver came to our command in the summer of 1862 as a recruit and was assigned to Company E. I had been acquainted with him several years before the war. He had been up to the time he enlisted a temperate, industrious man, and I never noticed anything out of the ordinary about him. When he came to the service as a recruit he appeared to grasp the situation at once and readily performed his duty at drill and otherwise as other soldiers in the command. This was kept up by him for some two months or more. Then I noticed a change in his demeanor; from being a jovial, rollicking disposition he became selfish and noncommunicative, with a seeming desire to be alone, and when not on duty he would sit for hours at a time in silent communion with himself, and it became apparent to his comrades that his mind was not right, that something appeared to be troubling him.

He became sulky and morose, and the features of his face had an unnatural and unusual appearance. This condition lasted some two or three weeks, and one night while on picket duty with two or three of the boys they found a human skull in the woods and brought it to camp. They told Oliver it was what he would look like. This was the straw that broke the camel's back, and poor Oliver became completely unstrung and his mind unbalanced, and in a day or two after he wandered away and disappeared, and I saw nothing more of him until after the close of the war.

It is my opinion that he never again gained his right mind. After the war he became a raving maniac, shouting, singing, praying, cursing, and preaching almost in the same breath. He continued in this condition for several years before he was declared insane in the year 1887.

It is my candid opinion, and this opinion is based on my knowledge and acquaintance with the man before he enlisted and from what I saw of him in the Army, that his mind became unbalanced—in other words, he became insane—while he was in service and was not accountable for the act of desertion.

F. M. DUNKIN.

There are two or three other affidavits, Mr. Chairman, corroborating this affidavit which I have just read.

Mr. SLAYDEN. None of these affidavits are made by medical officers.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. They are made by his comrades who were in the Army with him.

Mr. SLAYDEN. They expressed an opinion that because he was moody and timid, and deserted, that he was insane.

Mr. HOLLIDAY. The evidence further shows that shortly after the war he was found in a poorhouse in a neighboring county, violently insane; that he remained insane the balance of his life, was committed to an asylum twice, and died there.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The best evidence in support of this claim that I can find is in the fact that there is proof that there was insanity in the man's family, that an uncle died of insanity, and that the man himself became insane some time after the war. In view of that fact, sir, I shall not interpose further objection to the consideration of this claim; but I do believe that the evidence submitted as a justification for the enactment of this bill is not such as is entitled to respect or consideration by this House. In this particular case, however, in view of the fact, as I have just said, that they do seem to have established by proper medical authority that there was insanity in the family, I am willing to give the widow of the soldier the benefit of the doubt, and I withdraw my objection to the consideration of the bill, and in view of the further fact that the gentleman from Indiana says he has personal knowledge of the case.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JACKSON PRYOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13660) for the relief of Jackson Pryor.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Jackson Pryor, of Company D, Twelfth Regiment Kentucky Volunteer Infantry, so as to grant him an honorable discharge as of the date when said company was mustered out of the service of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I wish to ask the gentleman representing the committee whether he will not consent to an amendment of the rate which has been fixed here. I should like to make a statement of the facts of the case and upon that statement to ask a slight increase in the rate.

Mr. BROMWELL. This bill was examined by a subcommittee of which the gentleman's colleague [Mr. BOREING] was the chairman; and that gentleman was satisfied with the rate fixed in the bill; and it is in accordance with the recommendation of the committee in all similar cases. As a member of the committee, I could not consistently consent to any increase beyond what has been allowed in similar cases, equally meritorious with this. The bill was considered fully in the committee, the gentleman's colleague having had charge of the bill as subcommitteeman, and he was satisfied with this rate, and so reported.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. My reason for making this request is that after the committee had taken action, my colleague [Mr. BOREING] explained to me about the matter, and I understood that a different rate had been fixed from that which now appears in the amendment.

Mr. BROMWELL. No; the bill was passed in this form at a session of the committee last Wednesday, and the rate fixed here is the limit that we allow upon such a state of facts as that here presented.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The chairman will doubtless remember that this is a case of entire dependence. This widow is at a very advanced age and is without any property whatever. I do not know anything about the rate fixed by the committee in other cases, but this lady, now 70 years of age, is in feeble health without a dollar's worth of property outside of the little clothing that she may have. She has no children or other near relatives upon whom to depend for assistance. And it does seem to me that if it is the purpose and policy of this Government to see that the widows of those who have fought in the various wars of the country shall not suffer, we ought to allow to a woman circumstanced as this old lady is more than $12 a month.

Mr. BROMWELL. In the case of the ex-soldier himself the rule of the committee fixes the rate at only $20 in extreme cases—where he is absolutely helpless—$16 where the circumstances are such as in this case.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In this case Congress fixed a rate for the husband of this lady at $25 a month. That is the rate fixed by special act.

Mr. BROMWELL. By special act; yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. That is the rate fixed in this case by Congress a few years before the death of the husband; and when he died, of course the pension dropped down to the regular rate of $8 a month.

As I have already stated, this old lady has not a dollar's worth of property outside of the little clothing that she owns; she has no home and no children or other near relatives upon whom she might depend for any financial assistance. It does seem to me that a rate ought to be fixed——

Mr. BROMWELL. All those circumstances were taken into account by the committee, and the rate fixed is in accordance with the precedents in similar cases and with the rule that we have adhered to. We have had cases similar to this in which the rate has been fixed at $12 a month.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I will ask the gentleman whether the committee takes the view that it should adopt a certain rate, regardless of the question whether it will keep a widow in comfort or not? I think we should endeavor to allow a rate which will keep a widow in these circumstances in ordinary comfort.

Mr. BROMWELL. I do not so understand the intention of the committee or of Congress. So far as that matter is concerned, I very much doubt whether in any but exceptional cases a pension will permit either the soldier himself or his widow to live in what may be called "comfortable circumstances." That is not the object of the pension. It is not the purpose to put these pensioners in the condition in which they would be if the soldier were able to work and earn a living, but simply to contribute something for the support of the pensioner.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. In speaking of "comfortable circumstances" I did not mean what the gentleman assumes I did. I meant simply that the pension should be such as to keep the pensioner from want.

Mr. BROMWELL. There are widows who are receiving but $8 a month. According to the theory of the gentleman, we should have to increase all such pensions.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. A great many pensioners, of course, have some property outside of the pension.

Mr. BROMWELL. And a great many have not.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. So far as I am concerned, I think the Government can well afford to pay to widows circumstanced as this lady is such a sum as will keep them from actual want, and I do not believe that at the present time a pension of $12 a month will afford such a support.

The question being taken, the amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN A. SPALDING.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1637) granting an increase of pension to John A. Spalding.

Palmer, deceased, late of Company A, Second Regiment Missouri Mounted Infantry, war with Mexico, and pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 6 strike out "deceased."
In lines 7 and 8, after the word "Infantry," insert "Volunteers."
In line 9 strike out "sixteen" and insert "twelve."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY COOK.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, during my absence, I understand, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] made some objection to the bill (H. R. 917) for the relief of Henry Cook. I have since conferred with him, and he has withdrawn his objection to the measure, and I now ask that it be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has already been reported. The gentleman from Wisconsin states that the objections of the gentleman from Texas have been withdrawn. The question now is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken, and the bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAPRON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that they be passed, respectively, with or without amendments, and that the bill H. R. 12600 be laid on the table.

Senate bill of the following title, reported from the Committee of the Whole House with amendment, was taken up, the amendment agreed to, and the bill as amended ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

S. 1634. An act to remove the charge of desertion against Thomas Cordingly.

GEORGE S. GRAHAM.

The following bill, in accordance with the recommendation of the committee, was laid on the table:

A bill (H. R. 12600) granting an increase of pension to George S. Graham.

On motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the various bills were passed was laid on the table.

INFECTIOUS AND CONTAGIOUS DISEASES OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent now that the bill which I attempted to call up this morning be made a special order for to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal; and in connection with that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desires to make a statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this bill be made a special order for to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, just one word. If I may be indulged just a moment by the House, this bill consists of four sections. It is legislative in its nature, all except sections 3 and 4, which appropriate a million dollars. Now, I have no objection to the consideration of the legislative part of the bill. On the contrary, I believe it ought to be considered. The matter of appropriation, however, is pending before the Committee on Appropriations by an estimate received and referred to the committee, under the rules, printed for the first time this morning. That committee, I am satisfied, will diligently and vigilantly take up the matter of that appropriation in connection with the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And action can be obtained more quickly in that way.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; I think if such is the sense of the House and of the Senate, that an apt appropriation would be made more quickly that way than it would to take it up on a bill containing legislative provisions which may lead to more or less of discussion. Therefore, if it were necessary, if this was under consideration, I should make opposition and points of order to the appropriation contained in sections 3 and 4; and I suggest to the gentleman that he couple with his request for consideration of this bill to-morrow an amendment that at the time unanimous consent is given sections 3 and 4, being the appropriating sections of the bill, be stricken out of it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly agreeable to that. My only object is to place in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture the funds to combat this disease.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York amends his request by the suggestion that by unanimous consent sections 3 and 4, making an appropriation, be stricken from the bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, one moment. I have reserved the right to object. I want to object to the legislative part. There are some very serious objections which have occurred to me, and I have read the bill again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is one of consideration to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to say to the gentleman from Georgia that I understood him to say he would have no objection if action was deferred until to-morrow.

Mr. MADDOX. I did say so at that time, but I have read the bill again.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The gentleman from Georgia does not object to the bill being considered, does he?

Mr. MADDOX. I have read the bill again, and I think we ought to have more time to consider it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There will be plenty of time for debate to-morrow.

Mr. MADDOX. I do not see any reason why this matter should be brought up and rushed through, containing, as it does, legislation affecting every State in the Union, and also appropriating a million dollars and turning it over to the Secretary of Agriculture to expend just as he sees proper. I am opposed to that sort of legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There will be no attempt to-morrow to curb debate or to limit the time. Everybody will have a chance to debate the bill.

Mr. MADDOX. That is exactly what I have heard many times before. If you will let it go until Monday, I will not object.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the gentleman agree to Monday?

Mr. MADDOX. I will.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Monday is District day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York modify his request?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Monday is District day, and we can not get it up then.

Mr. MADDOX. Make it Tuesday, then.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I want to avoid delay. The Secretary considers this matter to be of great importance.

Mr. MADDOX. My dear sir, they all consider their matters of great importance when they come here.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. We may get through with the District business in time on Monday to take up this matter later in the day. Let it come in just behind the District business Monday, if we can, and if not, then take it up Tuesday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I withdraw the other motion, Mr. Speaker, and ask unanimous consent that it be considered on Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is District day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this bill be considered immediately after the reading of the Journal on Monday.

Mr. PEARRE. Monday is District day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suggest that the gentleman modify his request so that it be immediately after the disposition of the District business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. You see the difficulty I am placed in. It immediately reaches a lot of business coming up, and objection is made.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think the gentleman had better modify his request so that it be immediately after the disposition of District business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The trouble is the union-station bill comes up on Monday, and that may take more than one day.

Mr. PEARRE. By special order of the House Monday next is District day for the consideration of the union-station bill; and in the absence of the chairman of the committee I suggest to the Speaker and the House that it would be unwise to change that order.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will modify my request so as to make it Tuesday, immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York changes his request, so that it be taken up on Tuesday.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee (to Mr. WADSWORTH). Suppose we get through with District business in two or three hours?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there any objection to the request as modified by the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CANNON. Of course, that includes the conversation that was had about sections 3 and 4.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That includes the withdrawal of the appropriation. If there be no objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXVI, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees as indicated below:

S. 6447. An act to amend section 1706, Revised Statutes, relating to consuls—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. 6439. An act for the refund of certain tonnage taxes—to the Committee on Claims.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I give notice that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, I shall ask the House to take the bill up for consideration.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I reserve all points of order upon the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee reserves all points of order upon the bill.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE HON. JAMES M'MILLAN.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House meet on Sunday, the 1st day of February, 1903, at 12 o'clock noon, for the consideration of resolutions of respect to the memory of the late JAMES MCMILLAN, a distinguished member of the United States Senate from the State of Michigan.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUBSISTENCE OF THE ARMY.

On Executive Document No. 88, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for subsistence of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, the reference was changed from the Committee on Appropriations to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ALLEN of Maine, for five days, on account of the death of a relative.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

And accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting abstracts of proposals for material and labor in connection with the works under the Engineer Department of the Army—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting documents relating to the claim of John W. Mallon—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, December 13, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE SENATOR SEWELL, OF NEW JERSEY.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I beg leave to submit a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House meet on Sunday, the 8th day of February, 1903, at 12 o'clock noon, for the consideration of resolutions commemorative of the life, character, and services of the late Gen. WILLIAM J. SEWELL, a Senator of the United States from the State of New Jersey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

JEROME P. BATES.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on Friday, the 12th instant, a bill (H. R. 2570) granting an increase of pension to Jerome P. Bates was reported from the Committee of the Whole House and passed by the House, although in fact the said bill had never been referred to the Committee of the Whole House, not having been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: Therefore,

Resolved, That the action of the Committee of the Whole House and of the House on said bill H. R. 2570 be, and hereby is, vacated.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it seems that this resolution declares void the passage of a bill which has never been reported. How is it possible that a bill of that class could be on the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The wrong number was on the Calendar. It was an error in the printing and it led the House into this mistake. A motion having been made to reconsider and laid on the table, the Chair can see no other way to accomplish the result.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It was a mistake, then, in the number of the bill?

The SPEAKER. That is all. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MARSHALL for the day, on account of important business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. 15973) to pay in part judgments rendered under the act of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Hawaii for property destroyed in suppressing the bubonic plague in that Territory in 1899 and 1900, and authorizing the Territory of Hawaii to issue bonds for the payment of the remaining claims, was referred to the Committee on the Territories instead of the Committee on Claims.

Also, reference of Document No. 84, relating to emoluments of customs officers, was changed from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department to the Committee on Ways and Means.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 215. An act regulating the duties and fixing the compensation of customs inspectors at the port of New York;

S. 3083. An act providing for the adjudication of certain claims by the Court of Claims;

S. 3316. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to create a new division in the western judicial district of the State of Missouri," approved January 24, 1901;

S. 4083. An act for the relief of Surg. John F. Bransford, U. S. N.;

S. 4419. An act to incorporate the general education board;

S. 4204. An act relating to grants of land to the Territory and State of Washington for school purposes;

S. 6070. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at a point to be selected, within 5 miles north of the Kaw River, in Wyandotte County, State of Kansas, and Clay County, State of Missouri, and to make the same a post route;

S. 911. An act authorizing the Federal Railroad Company to construct a combined railroad, wagon, and foot-passenger bridge across the Missouri River at or near the village of Oacoma, Lyman County, S. Dak.; and

S. 6138. An act to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the Wind Cave National Park.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. 15794) to amend section 20 of an act entitled "An act to simplify the laws in relation to the collection of the revenues," approved June 10, 1890.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 1, 1904. Pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman from Georgia from the Committee on Appropriations if there is any desire for general debate upon his side?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I have had no request on our side of the House for time. I suppose that general debate might be concluded in ten minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I will ask, Mr. Speaker, that general debate be limited to ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and asks that general debate be limited to ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object to that. I do not know that I have anything to say and I do not know whether anybody else has anything to say, but I do not think that we should agree to close this general debate in ten minutes. We do not know what may be said or done in the general debate in the meantime.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to say that the bill will be taken up immediately under the five-minute rule, and gentlemen will learn the whole contents step by step.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion of Mr. BINGHAM was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MONDELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, in submitting this bill to the House, I would state that it enters into large economies, and in the detailed statement, which gentlemen will find on the first page of the report, to which I propose at this time only to refer, because as we proceed in the bill the report fully sets out every change that your committee recommend. I would read for the information of the House the estimates, which gentlemen will find in the Book of Estimates of 1904, which aggregates $27,354,000 in round numbers, of which amount there is recommended in the bill $26,931,000.

The appropriation for the same purposes for the current fiscal year, including $1,038,000 carried in the sundry civil bill and the deficiency appropriations in other acts, aggregated $26,430,000, being $500,000 less than is recommended in the present bill for the service of the fiscal year 1904. The total amount recommended in the bill is $423,000 less than the aggregate of the estimates submitted. The whole number of salaries specifically provided for in this bill is 607 less than the number estimated for, and 226 more than the number provided for in the law for the current year.

It is proper to state for the information of the House that of the 226 salaries increased in the bill 29 are for Representatives in Congress authorized by the last apportionment bill; 62 are for the Civil Service Commission, to take the place of 72 employees now on detail from the several Departments; 34 are for the National Bureau of Standards, which was authorized under a recent act of Congress; 32 are in the General Land Office, and 53 in the Post-Office Department.

It is proposed in the bill to continue for another year the general appropriation for temporary employees in the War Department, the same being decreased $47,000 in accordance with the reductions already made by the Secretary in the force; and there is a further reduction of $7,500 on account of the reduction of the work which will follow in the Ordnance Bureau by the enactment of the provision recommended by the committee requiring that ordnance property returns or accounts, heretofore made quarterly, shall be made semiannually.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania how many temporary employees there are in the War Department alluded to in the statement which the gentleman has just made?

Mr. BINGHAM. The paragraph which we embrace in our bill carries a bulk sum, in accordance with the current law, less the reduction recommended by the Secretary, of $47,470; and if the amendment submitted by the committee should be approved by the House there will be a further reduction of $7,500 in the accounts of the Ordnance Bureau.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman does not quite catch my idea.

Mr. BINGHAM. As to the sum total, the committee is not familiar with that. But this leaves the current law as the law for the next year, the argument being that there has not been on the part of the Secretary that reduction which the committee had hoped for, and as the Secretary has reduced the sum total upward of $50,000, we believed that, leaving the expenditure of this appropriation to his discretion, he would come in in the next fiscal year with the same appeal made to the committee one year ago—to classify this body of subordinates—and that he would come in with a much larger reduction. Also, for this reason, it has been the experience of the committee that as soon as you classify a body of clerks previously existing under a general bulk appropriation, or once covered by an appropriation bill in detail, it becomes almost absolutely impossible for your committee to reverse or undo what has been done.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My friend does not catch the point of my question. I hope I shall now make myself clear. How many temporary employees——

Mr. BINGHAM. I can not answer that question at this time, but will endeavor to do so when we come to consider the bill in detail.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why do we have any temporary employees in the War Department?

Mr. BINGHAM. I can now answer the gentleman's inquiry. There are 587 under the present appropriation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How long have they been temporary?

Mr. BINGHAM. For one year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Why are they temporary at all?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Secretary has asked for a continuing appropriation in the divisions of the War Department, classifying this body of 587 clerks. Your committee thought that the wiser legislative action would be to decline to authorize this detail for the respective bureaus, believing that as the sum total will be handled by the Secretary there will be brought to us for the following year under appropriations here contained a larger reduction of force. Because, as I have stated, when a change of this kind has once been embodied in the classified service of the Department we have always found difficulty in making a reduction. Throwing the onus on the Secretary, we look forward to a larger reduction than we have been able to make in the pending bill.

Mr. MADDOX. One question, if the gentleman pleases. In the last appropriation bill, as I understand, the committee made permanent all temporary employees previously authorized in the War and Navy Departments. Now, are these another extra batch?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No; they are the same men.

Mr. MADDOX. They can not be.

Mr. BINGHAM. These appointments are not permanent. They are made under a paragraph of the current law, which carries them as a temporary force, the onus being upon the Secretary to handle this force economically.

Mr. HEMENWAY rose.

Mr. MADDOX. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] knows what I am after.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the chairman will permit, there has been no additional force added. If the gentleman remembers, we had a large temporary force made necessary by the war with Spain.

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. A year ago the different departments asked that that force be provided for specifically. That we declined to do. The result has been that during the last year about $55,000 of that force has been dropped. They ask again this year that we provide for the force on the regular bill. That we decline to do, hoping that if we carry it as a lump sum for another year there will be a still greater reduction.

Mr. MADDOX. I will ask the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, when his committee had the last appropriation bill passed, and when he came to make provision for these temporary clerks, if he made them permanent instead of temporary. What I want to know is, Is this the same crowd or an additional batch?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There are no additional clerks added, and they were not made permanent on the last bill. They were covered into the civil service, but still carried by a lump-sum appropriation, with the hope that the force will be greatly reduced if it is not provided for specifically.

Mr. MADDOX. These are the same ones, as I understand it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. These are the same ones, except with about $55,000 of reduction. We believed that had we made them permanent last year, we would not have secured the reduction of $55,000, and we decline to make them permanent this year, with the hope of securing a still greater reduction.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. How many of these employees were placed under the War Department, under the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. About 600, I believe.

Mr. BINGHAM. Five hundred and eighty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. They were the real temporary force as put there because of the war that we were then engaged in. That war is now at an end. Will the gentleman tell me why we want to continue the expense of this great temporary force that has been really legalized and made a permanent force?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Because the business of the Government has increased to such an extent that the Departments insist they can not get along without this force. Of course there has been a great reduction, but they can not get along if the whole force is cut out. We are carrying it along, hoping to get as many as possible out of the service before they are provided for specifically.

Mr. MADDOX. I will ask the gentleman how that reduction came about?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The $55,000?

Mr. MADDOX. Yes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. By reason of resignation or death or by their getting out of the way and their places not being filled.

Mr. MADDOX. Does the gentleman know the politics of those clerks who have gotten out of the way?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, we made no inquiry into that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a moment. The gentleman states that this diminution has been brought about by two reasons—first, where they have resigned, and, second, where they have died. That clearly shows that the Department as such is not trying to reduce this temporary force.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit, I will add that it also covered incompetent clerks who have been discharged.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then it is not the purpose of the Department to reduce this temporary force further, because it is only when the clerks die or resign or are unworthy to be kept in office that the Department reduces its temporary force of about 600 employees.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman makes a statement which is not warranted. The Department insists that they do need these clerks, not only these clerks, but they are constantly asking for an increase of the force, which the committee has declined to grant in a great many instances.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Who has asked for that?

Mr. BINGHAM. The Secretary of War.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yet the gentleman will depend on that Department, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to reduce this temporary force and rid the Government of this burden of five or six hundred employees.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state briefly to the gentleman that there were only two propositions under consideration before the committee. One was to continue the current law for the next fiscal year, which appropriates a bulk sum for the emergency requirements of the War Department. That the Secretary reduces and submits to the committee by paragraphs in the bill, detailing these men to the different divisions of the War Department and absorbing all that the current law allows, with the exception of the reduction of $55,000.

There were only two propositions before the committee: Shall we continue this sum in bulk which the Secretary asks for in detail to the bureau? We concluded that larger economy in the near future would result to the Government in that Department by allowing him the same discretion which he has had heretofore, which we thought would justify in the next year $50,000 of reduction. We do not change a word of existing law save in the sum total of the allowances under that temporary or emergency paragraph in the bill. It is done wholly in the interest of economy in administration.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. On page 57 of the bill there is an item which reads as follows:

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $75,000.

I should like to ask the gentleman whether that is the same estimate that was allowed last year?

Mr. BINGHAM. The same amount as in the current law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The same amount as last year?

Mr. BINGHAM. The same amount as this year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And that proved sufficient, did it?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the estimate of the Department.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right. I had an impression that it was $100,000.

Mr. LOUD. I should like to ask the gentleman why he has failed to mention, on page 125 of the bill, the appropriation of $20,000 for a temporary force carried in the Post-Office Department? And I should like him also to explain what necessity there is longer for any temporary employment in the Post-Office Department as a result of the Spanish war.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Department asked that this force might be classified and go under what are called first, second, third, and fourth class clerks, together with the attendant subordinate force. Your committee thought that economy would follow, just the same as we believe it will follow in the estimates of the Secretary of War for next year, and believed that a better policy would prevail by leaving it with the Department.

Mr. LOUD. Of course the gentleman is aware that in the War Department the acquisition of the Philippine Islands entailed some additional expense; but the acquisition of the Philippine Islands can entail no additional expense on the Post-Office Department, because our Post-Office Department has nothing to do with the Philippine Islands.

Mr. BINGHAM. When we come to that paragraph of the bill, if the gentleman desires, he can call it up, and I will refer to it in my notes.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the report of the committee of course sets out fully and distinctly and in detail everything that there is in the bill, whether in one bureau, division, department or another.

The only purpose that I have now, Mr. Chairman, is to call the attention of the House, on page 71 of the bill, to the item for the mint at New Orleans, La. The committee reports the bill with this change, that it shall be an assay office simply and no longer a mint. After the bill was made up and reported upon there was an understanding reached that the committee would accept an amendment to be offered by one of the members from Louisiana, reestablishing the current law in place of the paragraph in the bill covering the mint at New Orleans.

The gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. BINGHAM], who has just taken his seat, failed to make that statement, and I want to make it. It is understood in the Committee on Appropriations that that amendment will be accepted, and I hope that neither on this side of the House nor on the other will there be any objection to it. When that clause comes up, there will evidently be some discussion on it. If you will refer to the hearing before the committee, you will ascertain that in the opinion of the Director of the Mint the mint at Philadelphia alone is sufficient to do all the work to be done in this country. Then the San Francisco mint, he says, is able to do about all the work, independent of the Philadelphia mint. We are also building a very extensive mint about halfway between here and the Pacific coast, at Denver. These things will all come up, but for good and sufficient reasons, after the bill was reported, we believed that for another year at least the provisions of the current law should be continued with reference to the mint at New Orleans, hoping that conditions may change there so as to give the mints more business. It is very likely that if the question of an isthmian canal is settled and the project entered upon the mint at New Orleans will assume a very different attitude to the business of the country to what it has had in the past and what it has now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk of printing records, $2,220; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk, $2,220; messenger, to be appointed by the committee, $1,440; clerk and stenographer to the Committee on Finance, $2,500; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Claims, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Commerce, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Pensions, $2,220; two assistant clerks, at $1,440 each; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on the Judiciary, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on the District of Columbia, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Foreign Relations, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Committee on Engrossed Bills, $2,220; messenger, $1,440; clerk to the Joint Committee on the Library, $2,220; clerks to the committees on Naval Affairs, Census, Public Lands, Indian Affairs, to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, Public Buildings and Grounds, Agriculture and Forestry, Education and Labor, Territories, Interstate Commerce, Public Health and National Quarantine, Private Land Claims, Patents, Coast Defenses, Privileges and Elections, Additional Accommodations for the Library of Congress, Rules, Civil Service and Retrenchment, Enrolled Bills, Geological Survey, Railroads, Pacific Railroads, Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, Philippines, Relations with Cuba, Interoceanic Canals, Transportation and Sale of Meat Products, Five Civilized Tribes of Indians, Improvement of the Mississippi River and its Tributaries, and clerk to conference minority of the Senate, at $2,220 each; clerks to committees on Woman Suffrage, and Mines and Mining, at $2,100 each; in all, $124,540.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an inquiry here of some gentleman of the committee about this appropriation for clerks to Committees on Woman Suffrage and on Mines and Mining at $2,100 each. Of course there is a Committee on Mines and Mining. I have looked through the Congressional Directory for the Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, and I can find no such committee as the Committee on Woman Suffrage. Now, if there is such a committee of the House I would like to know when it has met and if it ever meets, or something about it. I never heard of the committee before.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that this has reference to Senate committees. It has been the policy of the House for some years past that in the general conduct of the respective Houses there has been no interference on the part of either as against the legislation proposed. Each of them is supposed to be the best judge of the expenditures necessary for the general conduct of their business. The only limitation or contest we have had for some years is in the appropriation for the contingent fund. Perhaps the contest was greater in the conference committee last year, and more earnest than heretofore, and we were successful in securing from the Senate a reduction of $25,000 from their contingent fund; but the House, for a number of years past, I think for eight or ten years, has conceded the Senate as being the better judge as to what should be the expenditure of that body, as they have conceded to us without criticism the government of this House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I understand this is a Senate committee and not a House committee?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, the bill so states. If the gentleman will read the bill he will see it.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is in the Senate paragraph; we have not reached the House paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Speaker: For private secretary to the Speaker, $2,350; clerk to the Speaker's table, $3,600, and for preparing Digest of the Rules, $1,000 per annum; clerk to the Speaker, $1,600; messenger to the Speaker, $1,200; in all, $9,750.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I see in that paragraph there are quite a number of increases. Here is one I would like the gentleman to explain why it is so, reserving the point of order in the meantime; that is, the increase of salary to the clerk at the Speaker's table from $2,250 to $3,600?

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman simply desire a reason for the advance?

Mr. MADDOX. That is what I want to know.

Mr. BINGHAM. Your committee recognize the fact that perhaps the most valuable adjunct to the Speaker is this clerk, who heretofore has received a compensation under current law of $2,250. An appeal was very earnestly made that this was hardly a fair compensation for his valuable services, and as others at the desk receive a larger compensation, your committee thought that, in view of the great value of his services and his large experience, there was a fair warrant for the House to give to this trained subordinate a good compensation.

Mr. MADDOX. Is it not strange that it has never been done before?

Mr. BINGHAM. He is specially learned in the rules, and the Speaker must really, in a large measure, depend upon him; and when the request was made we recognized the force of the appeal and granted it.

Mr. MADDOX. Let me ask you this question: Did the entire committee, Democrats and Republicans, agree to this increase?

Mr. BINGHAM. The bill comes out of the committee unanimously. We bring the bill into the House without objection.

Mr. MADDOX. All right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Chaplain: For Chaplain of the House, $900.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 21, page 11, strike out the words "nine hundred" and insert "one thousand."

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I think——

Mr. BINGHAM. I reserve the point of order. I do not know that I will make it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment will appeal to every member in the House. The salary of our Chaplain is fixed at $900. There is hardly a pastor at any cross roads in the country who does not get this amount, and in most cases more. But I am sure, Mr. Chairman, when we ask a minister to come here every time the House is opened, day after day and week after week, that the House will concede a reasonable and fair pay for such services. This is an increase of only $100 per year, and I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will accept the amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that for a number of years this has been the appropriation for this service, that the same compensation is allowed in the Senate, and therefore we have been consistent. I will not make the point of order against the gentleman's proposition, but will submit it to the House.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of the Clerk: For Clerk of the House of Representatives, including compensation as disbursing officer of the contingent fund, $5,000.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like an explanation of the increase that is made here, reserving the point of order on the salary of that individual. In fact, the increases right along there are too numerous to mention.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman that the Clerk insists that the allowance heretofore made is not sufficient in dollars and cents to pay what he actually pays out. He asks this increase, and the committee unanimously gave it to him.

Mr. BINGHAM. And right in that connection I will state that in all departments of the Government we are met with the request for these little increases on these items generally throughout the bill, and when the statements have been reasonable and fair we have conceded them.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I notice that there are a number of increases in the bill, especially for the officers of the House. I want to say in this connection that the Appropriations Committee of this House is the absolute legislative body, so far as appropriations are concerned, for this reason.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me say to the gentleman that this man has three horses to keep, together with the repairs of the wagon.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say that, so far as he is concerned, I think he deserves it far more than any other man you have given an increase to. But I want to make these observations: The Appropriations Committee, by reason of the rules or the methods which they have adopted, absolutely control all the appropriations in this body. For instance, as I have had occasion to say before, this bill was reported to the House yesterday, and this morning copies of it are placed on our table, but so far no man outside of the committee is able to take the bill and the report and digest it and be able to get up and discuss these matters intelligently as to the whys and wherefores of the proposed increases. It is a matter of absolute impossibility.

Here we have an increase for a great many officers of the House, continued from page to page in this bill. We have got a Democratic minority and a Republican majority. The people who are outside of the committee—the Representatives—are not given notice of what is in the bill until it is brought in, and then it is immediately taken up for consideration. Usually it is the custom of the Appropriations Committee in this House to come in here with a bill on one day and give notice that they will call it up the next morning, and no mortal man can take one of these bills, see what there is in it, and then get evidence to show that these men are not entitled to the increases that are proposed before the bill comes up for consideration.

Now, I say that the rules of this House ought to be changed, so far as the Appropriations Committee is concerned, so that the bill shall be reported at least three days before it is taken up, so that we can see and understand the reason of the proposed provision.

Now, if the House is content with this state of affairs, very well; but on this side of the House we will continue to call attention to these increases. I am going to do it, and if I find any place where I think I am justified, if I have any knowledge of a state of affairs I believe to be unjustifiable, I will raise the point of order and have it struck out. But I wanted to make these observations. I have said something like this before.

I might say another word. No man can rise in this House and make an amendment to this appropriation bill. If I want to increase an appropriation, one of the committee is on the spot to raise the point of order, just as my friend over there did a few minutes ago. Yet you gentlemen of the committee violate yourselves this very rule that you set up against us. You do it all the time. Let any other member bring in an amendment here increasing an appropriation, and we have the gentleman from Illinois over there on the watch, ready to raise the point of order and drive us out. Now, I think this is all wrong. I think we ought to have notice of what is going on and what is proposed. I mean sufficient and timely notice, so that we may be prepared to discuss the different provisions of the bill. We are as much entitled to know where the people's money is going as the members of the Appropriations Committee—just the same right. We ought to have notice, so that we can have sufficient time to examine all of these proposed increases. It is impossible for us to do anything unless the rules are changed or the committee changes its practice.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say to the gentleman that the eight pages of our report go into all the changes and into every detail of it—all the changes included in this great bill. It gives every change we have made in the appropriations in every detail.

Mr. MADDOX. That is not the question I am raising.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have stated to the gentleman what is proposed to be done, and the gentleman ought not to take exception. I am perfectly willing to answer any question with reference to any change that we have made; but I want to impress this on the gentleman, that throughout this bill we have endeavored to preserve the most rigid economy possible in our examination covering ten days.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, Mr. Chairman, that is exactly what I am saying. He says it took him ten days in order to see whether these amendments were proper or not.

Now, what I want is three days, in order that I may see whether you are right or wrong in these matters. With opportunity for examination we might have something to say, something that you have not heard.

Mr. BINGHAM. In all good nature let me say that in view of the fact that the hearings before the committee are in print, each paragraph can be considered in connection with the hearings relating to them. In this matter we are simply following the policy or practice of the House. Every convenience is arranged for the examination of these different matters in their order, and there can be no difficulty on the part of one gentleman or another in the House, whenever the provocative comes to his mind, in making the necessary inquiry and securing a fair explanation.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman seems not to understand me. While you make your reports and point out what these errors are, you do not give us time to find out for ourselves anything about the case.

Mr. BINGHAM. Each gentleman can have his five minutes on any paragraph.

Mr. CLARK. Let me state what I understand to be the trouble about this matter. The contention of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] is well taken—that we have had no adequate time in which to examine this appropriation bill, which carries many millions. The Committee on Appropriations—I have no disposition to criticise them—come in here after a thorough investigation of the bill; they have formulated in their minds the various reasons in favor of these increases. This bill was brought in here last evening; it was printed last night. We come here this morning and get hold of the report. Suppose we read it. That is easy enough. Suppose our attention is attracted to an item which you want to pass, but as to which we are not satisfied. It is true that every member has his five minutes under the rules to discuss these questions, but where is time allowed for us to investigate and compare the facts? When a man undertakes to make a speech or an argument here, the easiest part of it is to stand up and make the speech or argue the question, provided he has his data; but what we require is time and opportunity to secure such data.

The gentleman from Georgia is entirely right. No appropriation bill ought ever to be considered by this House until there has been two or three days' notification of its consideration, so as to give members of the House a chance to prepare for debating the questions of detail intelligently. Of course the majority always has the advantage in this business, because under the peculiar machinery that has grown up here—I am not going to discuss that now—the majority is always informed as to what is coming up. Sometimes they have information a week ahead, but the minority is obliged to take a snap shot at the question. Now, that is very nice for you gentlemen over there, as you are in the majority; but the "whirligig of time" brings its own revenge, and the time is pretty certain to come when you will be in the minority. You might just as well adopt fair rules about this method of proceeding now.

Then there is another consideration. With the way in which these bills are printed, you can not tell to save your soul in what item there is an increase and in what there is none without taking the bill and comparing it with the report.

Now, there are some of these increases to which I have no objection. For instance, I think that Mr. Hinds earns his money as much as any member on this floor earns his $5,000 a year, but the idea of increasing the salaries of all these employees is perfectly ridiculous. If every one of them were to die instantly with apoplexy, you could within a week replace them with men just as competent as they are at the old salaries, and, what is more, you would be deviled to death to make a selection among all the candidates. And if we were all to die in fifteen minutes with apoplexy, our places could be refilled, too, at the same salary.

This is all I have to say about this matter now. I am in favor of amending our rules so as to change this whole method of doing business.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Allow me to suggest that upon the Committee on Appropriations the minority is represented by able men; so the statement that when a bill of this kind is called up the majority alone understand what has been done in the bill is a mistake.

Mr. CLARK. Will you allow me a single sentence right here? I do not deny that the Democrats on this committee are able men; but what I say is that the rest of us, who are not on that committee, have just as much right to be informed about the conclusions of the committee as those gentlemen have.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reply to that suggestion, I will say that the Committee on Appropriations are always very careful, in bringing a bill before this House, to furnish complete information as to every change made in the bill. This report, which is a very short one, starts out with a general statement as to the total amount appropriated; then there is a detailed statement of the different changes under the several heads. For instance, with reference to the Senate, any member can readily take the bill and, referring to the report, can see every change in the current law which this bill proposes. So, too, with the House of Representatives. Turning to the bill, one can readily see every change in the current law made under that heading.

Now, as to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia to allow appropriation bills to lie over three days after being reported before they are considered, that is a matter to be determined when the rules of the House are made. In the short session if the appropriation bills had to lay over three days, evidently this House would be very much embarrassed, because it takes about all the time to pass the appropriation bills in the short session.

Mr. CLARK. And when are we to have a chance to amend these rules?

Mr. HEMENWAY. At the beginning of the next Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; and a resolution to adopt the rules of the Fifty-seventh Congress will be rammed through here in about two seconds and a half.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will say to the gentleman that if I were to determine how it should be done I would adopt the rules of the Fifty-seventh Congress, because we believe they are good rules. The gentleman, of course, does not think so.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask the gentleman one other question now——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Pardon me a moment. As to the criticism that the minority does not understand when this bill is to be called up or what the bill contains, I will say that is a mistake. The minority is represented by able men on that committee. This bill comes out of that committee with the unanimous approval of both the majority and the minority, for in the great Committee on Appropriations there is nothing of politics. It is a committee that has never had anything of politics connected with it since I have been a member of it, and I have been a member of that committee for eight years.

Mr. CLARK. Then I will ask the gentleman why he does not put some more Democrats on the committee. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Because, as the gentleman knows, it is not the policy of either the Democratic party or the Republican party to put the minority in control of any of the great committees of this House, and never will be.

Mr. CLARK. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him two questions at this time?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. CLARK. Granting, now, that the Democratic minority are able men, which I freely do, does not the gentleman think that I and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] and the rest of us have just as much right to object to any part of an appropriation bill and to assert our objections, and to be placed in a position to assert them intelligently, as any man on the committee, Democrat or Republican?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, we commend the gentleman's activity, and if there is anything in this bill wherein the Committee on Appropriations have erred we are pleased to have it pointed out, because the sole object of this committee in reporting the bill is to secure good service in the most economic way possible. We do not want to increase a single salary unless there is a good and sufficient reason for increasing it. Day after day we sit in that committee room and decline to increase salaries when the departments are down here urging it, and when members of Congress from both sides of the House are urging it for some particular constituent. This committee has to perform the unpleasant duty of declining to accede to these earnest requests, and it is only in cases where we think beyond question that the salaries ought to be increased that we do it. If any gentleman on that side of the House or on this side can point out any one of these salaries that has been increased unjustly, we would be glad to have it done and glad to have the information.

Mr. CLARK. Under the arrangement which now obtains I think two hours is the utmost limit in which one could have opportunity to examine this bill. If a man comes over here at 10 o'clock he may possibly get hold of one of these bills and the report and study it for two hours. Does the gentleman think that that allows time enough for a man who is not on his committee to prepare himself so that he may discuss the bill intelligently?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will ask the gentleman if this bill were reported and laid on the desk for one week, how many members he supposes would ever look at it?

Mr. CLARK. I do not know, but I will testify for one that I have made up my mind to investigate every appropriation bill which is brought into this House, if I can get the opportunity.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I commend the gentleman for his good resolutions.

Mr. CLARK. And I do not want to set myself up as "a watchdog of the Treasury," either.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman says that there is no partisanship in the Committee on Appropriations, that there is nothing of the sort there. If that is true, does it not make it of decidedly more importance that the other members of this House should have notice of what that committee is doing?

Mr. HEMENWAY. So far as the question of notice is concerned, the Committee on Appropriations has no objection to a week or three days' or ten days' time. We are simply presenting this bill under the rules of the House. Notice was given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] in charge of the bill, that it would be called up to-day. This is the short session of Congress. We are anxious to get the bill through the House, and I do believe that if my friends will go over this report they will have no trouble in ascertaining every change which is made in the bill as we come to it. If the committee has erred in any respect we would be very glad to have gentlemen call attention to it.

Mr. MADDOX. We have not had the time to do that very thing.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me, Mr. Chairman, perhaps there is one detail in this report that it would be well for the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to know, that the sum total of the increases of salaries in all the Departments only reaches the sum of $15,000.

Mr. CLARK. Now, let me ask you——

Mr. BINGHAM. As a general proposition, so far as I am personally concerned, I should have no objection at the organization of a Congress to the enactment of a rule providing that there should be a period intervening between the submission of an appropriation bill and its consideration by the House. We have established that rule with reference to conference reports. There is in the body of the rules the provision that a conference report can not be considered on the day that it is submitted to the House. Now, if the gentleman will follow me, the contention on this floor will be upon the increase of the subordinate force. If the gentleman will look at page 1 of the report he will see the discussion of the details that we have gone into, wherein we show the allowance of these 266 more than the number provided for the current year, and we have eliminated from the estimates of the departments 607. Now, there is the statement. Of course, if you desire to go into the details, we will endeavor to make them clear to the House at the proper time.

Mr. CLARK. I want one detail right now.

Mr. BINGHAM. One more point. The gentleman submits that that side of the House has not had the opportunity to make an examination of the bill. The gentleman has stated that that side of the House have representative, capable men upon the committee. The bill essentially, and in fact fully, comes out of the committee with a unanimous report. But the gentleman must remember that the examination of the bill does not only run to that side of the House, but gentlemen on this side of the House have equal cause for complaint, if there is any cause for complaint. The objection might just as well come from here as from there. Your interests are guarded, if you can have any special interest in this bill as a party, and I simply say to the gentleman that the element of party never enters into the consideration of this bill. It is a bill that carries the appropriations for the existing force of the Government; and there is no favoritism, for the reason that everyone, excepting in the most humble places under the Government, is under the civil service. The element of politics has never entered into our discussions, and I trust it never may, and this bill is built up on absolute lines of economy.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it is a fact that this bill was not reported to the House until late yesterday afternoon. If I am mistaken in my statement, I hope my friend will correct me. It is a fact that we all must know that the bill was printed last night, and that this morning for the first time it is placed on our desks with the report. It is a fact that it contains one hundred and forty-two printed pages, and I do not believe there is a man in this House, unless he is a member of the Committee on Appropriations, who has had a chance to go over any of the items of this bill. Now, I will ask my friend if he thinks that it is fair to the gentlemen of this House, on either side or both sides, to bring in the bill here yesterday afternoon, place it upon our desks this morning at 12 o'clock, and expect those outside of the committee to treat this question fairly or intelligently, no matter how fair and just they want to be to everybody, including the Government? Is it fair to do that? Is it right?

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state to the gentleman that the House has determined to take up this bill in Committee of the Whole, and we are only operating under the order of the House. Now, as to fairness, this bill simply carries the existing subordinate force with the necessary increases. It is not a complicated bill in legislation. It might be called one of the skeleton bills, it carries with it so little flesh. It has half a dozen common-sense amendments which can be explained in five minutes. It does not carry a complication of laws, and, to my mind, not a complication which is open to discussion.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose anyone on this side or that side——

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, there are no sides on this bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then suppose the other members of the House not members of your committee want to inquire into this matter?

Mr. BINGHAM. We are willing to answer every inquiry.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. This morning for the first time they have a chance even to know that there was an appropriation to be made for any item in the bill. The bill is first brought to their attention this morning. No one has had a chance to look into it. Yesterday they brought in an appropriation bill about diseased cattle—asked immediate consideration—but as usual the watchdog on this side [Mr. MADDOX] objected. For what reason? He said he wanted to investigate the bill. So did I, and we are doing so. That bill carries an appropriation of a million dollars and will be considered Tuesday next. Now, the bill under consideration appropriates how much?

Mr. BINGHAM. Twenty-six or twenty-seven million dollars.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It appropriates $26,931,053.16 and there are 8 pages of increases and the bill contains 142 pages of printed matter. The report of the committee covers 24 pages. None of these have we ever seen until noon to-day, having been printed last night.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will simply say to the gentleman that nine-tenths of the bill is simply a reenactment of current law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I take the gentleman's word for that, as I take the word of any other honest gentleman. He may be honestly mistaken. How many weeks did your committee spend in preparing this bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Ten days.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Working day and night?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; not night. [Laughter.]

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Then I want to state that I have talked here with some members of that committee who said that they were coming up here at night to work on that report. I do not know whether they wanted to prove to me that they were industrious, but they might have worked at something else. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. I would like to have five minutes of my own. I want to ask the gentleman from Indiana two or three questions in the first place. Are the number of clerks in the War Department cut down or increased by this bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are reduced from the appropriations of last year to the extent of $55,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Fifty-seven thousand.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, as a common-sense proposition this entire temporary force of the War Department ought to be wiped out right now, this minute; and I will give you the reason for it. It has been stated in the newspapers, and I suppose it is true, that the appropriations for the War Department for this year are to be cut down a little over $31,000,000. That is true, is it not? It is stated—I do not know whether in the President's message, but stated authoritatively anyway—that all our troops in the Philippine Islands have been withdrawn except 15,000. Now, if this is true, there is no sense and no reason for maintaining the remainder of the temporary force in the War Department.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman permit me right there?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish they could all be discharged right now, but they can not. When a regiment is mustered out the gentleman understands that then the statement of all the accounts comes up, and it takes two years sometimes before they can get these accounts settled. The work comes in and all the burden of the work comes as the men are discharged.

Mr. CLARK. Now, let me ask, as you know all things, how many hours a day do they work?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is claimed that eight hours is a day's work, but by every head of the Department who has come before our committee they insist that the clerks are working overtime; and the chairman of this committee, General BINGHAM, has just pointed out that we did not give the Department by more than 600 the number of clerks they asked. We have held them down until they insist that they are working their clerks overtime on account of their not having a sufficient force of clerks.

Mr. CLARK. I am glad that that is true, and so far, pro tanto, the committee ought to be thanked.

Mr. HEMENWAY. One additional statement. We have not increased a single man in the force of the War Department, nor have we increased a single salary in the War Department, but we reduced the sum total of the lump appropriation fifty-odd thousand dollars.

Mr. CLARK. Twice on the floor of this House the gentleman from Indiana has stated that 10 per cent of all the clerks in all the Departments at Washington are incapacitated for doing any work at all that amounts to anything. Now, I say that every one of them ought to be "bounced."

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I call the gentleman's attention to a section of this bill, that provides that the appropriations herein made for the officers, clerks, and persons employed in the public service shall not be available for the continuance of any person permanently incapacitated for the performance of such service? The committee has inserted that provision of law. I regret that we can not organize ourselves into a force to go down and see that the law is obeyed; but the law is not obeyed, and the committee has gone as far as it could by putting in that no money provided in this bill shall be available for the payment of incompetent clerks.

Mr. CLARK. That is the very best proof that can be had that my contention and the contention of the gentleman from Georgia is well taken—that we do not know what is in this bill simply because we have had no time to find out. If I had known that that provision was in here, I would not have made the remark that I made before; but we never had any chance to learn what is in this bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will ask the gentleman right now, what committees does the gentleman serve on?

Mr. CLARK. On the Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HEMENWAY. In reporting from your committee, do you see that at least three days elapse before your bill is taken up?

Mr. CLARK. No, we do not; but we ought to do so, and will hereafter, so far as I can influence its action.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then you have to rely upon the acts of the Committee on Appropriations as we have to rely upon the acts of the committee upon which the distinguished gentleman serves?

Mr. CLARK. Yes. Let me ask the gentleman a question. At the last session of Congress the Committee on Foreign Affairs reported to the House one of the most important bills reported here during the session—the Chinese-exclusion bill. There may have been 40 members of the House who wanted to argue that question. Suppose we had dumped it in one day and demanded consideration the next day? How would you have liked that?

Mr. DINSMORE. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Missouri to one fact in the bill. I realize the tender solicitude he feels on the subject of civil service in the Government, and I would like him to ascertain from the gentlemen who are informing us by slow process as to the contents of the bill the necessity for the appropriation, after the war with Spain, of more than half a million dollars for temporary clerks, messengers, etc. I would like him to ascertain why it is that they have precluded the possibility of making the appointments, of assigning persons to do that work, from the civil-service list—the eligible list.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We will take that up when we get to it.

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman misunderstood one remark I made before. I say as long as this Committee on Rules controls the machinery of this House it is in the power of the Speaker—and I am not complaining of the present Speaker or the former Speaker, Mr. Reed, for both of them have treated me very kindly—but it is in the power of the Speaker and two members of the Committee on Rules, and it does not make any difference which party is in power, to pick out a great measure that is going to be discussed here and determine in their own minds the day that it is going to be discussed, and then to give the men whom they want to have that knowledge ten days' notice that that bill is going to be taken up on a certain day and discussed; and it puts the proponents of the bill in a place of vast advantage over the men who want to oppose it. I say that such a thing could be done under the present system.

It is not right, and I do not care how able the members of the Appropriations Committee may be or how honest they may be, the humblest members on this floor have just as much right to their opinion about how the people's money should be disposed of as the members of the Appropriations Committee have.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Let me ask the gentleman a question. If a bill is before his committee, where he puts in days and weeks of time informing himself as to its merits, is it possible for myself or any other member who does not serve upon that committee to have the information on the bill that he himself has?

Mr. CLARK. No; I do not think it possible—certainly not probable. I am perfectly frank about that. If we had given a week's notice of the consideration of the Chinese bill, I undertake to say that there is not a member on the floor of the House who would have been as well informed on the subject as the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee, because we had given about two months to constant hearings by the ablest men in the country; but it is fair that we at least have a chance for our "white alley" in the debate, and I do not refer to Democrats any more than to Republicans.

Mr. MADDOX. I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that it would not take more than three days to find out about these increases in appropriations.

Mr. CLARK. No; we could find out all about these accounts. And, Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the increase of salaries except on a full and fair discussion. Now, I will make you a proposition. I am willing to make it to everybody. If you will give us ten days at the beginning of the next Congress to debate these rules and have a fair chance to amend them, I will not open my head about them again during this session of Congress. But to come in here as somebody will, and I have no doubt it will be the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. DALZELL, and make a motion that the rules of the Fifty-seventh Congress be adopted by the Fifty-eighth Congress, and have five minutes' debate on each side, or ten, it may be, and then for two years more all we can do is to howl about it and kick occasionally and sporadically. I am going to offer an amendment to the rules, either now or then, that every appropriation bill shall be printed and then lie on the table three days, so that everybody may have a chance to investigate it.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

To enable the Clerk of the House to prepare and complete a digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Fifty-second to the Fifty-seventh Congress, inclusive, 3 clerks, at $1,600 each, during the fiscal year 1903; in all, $4,800. And said work shall be completed and ready to be printed on or before July 30, 1904.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, why it is necessary to prepare and complete a digested summary in alphabetical list of private claims to be presented to the Fifty-seventh Congress?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, upon that paragraph I want to reserve a point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Does the gentleman from New York make an inquiry?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. This work was provided for at the last session and we are still continuing it, and if the gentleman will read to the close of the paragraph he will see that it is to be completed and ready to be printed on July 30, 1904.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What practical and substantial purpose will the printing serve?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am informed that the index will be valuable to members who are investigating these claims; when members come to the several sessions of the House, that index will be very valuable.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do you mean claims now pending before the Committee on Claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. Claims presented in the Fifty-second Congress and since, down to the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Suppose we have to consider only claims pending in the Fifty-seventh Congress, and either undetermined by the committee or not passed upon by the House, what purpose is served by having a record of claims introduced in several previous Congresses, from the Fifty-second to the Fifty-sixth, inclusive?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am informed that these claims run up into the thousands——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Which claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. That the only means by which you can find, for instance, a claim of John Smith is by such an index as this.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the amount of the proposed appropriation?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman will see that the paragraph reads:

Three clerks, at $1,600 a year; in all, $4,800.

That is the subordinate force.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the Committee on Claims, notwithstanding the fact that they have considered and passed upon in the committee room any number of claims introduced in this Congress, were unable during the last session, and it is quite evident that they will be unable during this session, to have considered by the House bills thus passed upon by the committee.

Now, with bills introduced in the Fifty-second, the Fifty-third, the Fifty-fourth, the Fifty-fifth, and the Fifty-sixth Congresses we have absolutely nothing to do; and I can not see what purpose is to be served by printing this index or digest, especially in view of the suggestion made by the President of the United States in his message, page 23, in which he deprecates "the growing tendency to provide for the publication of masses of documents for which there is no possible demand and for the printing of which there is no real necessity."

Now, this is a case within the line of the suggestion made by President Roosevelt. It is proposed that we print an index to claims which will never be looked at—claims totally dead—for the simple and sole purpose of affording so many places in this House not necessary at all, this index serving no purpose whatever except to mass up an amount of matter never to be looked at or considered.

If, on the other hand, this House could be brought to consider the claims reported by the Committee on Claims, some useful purpose might be served by preparing a list of claims pending in this committee; but to print a lot of stuff that will never be looked at by any person on earth, except as a matter of idle curiosity, is simply, it seems to me, entailing needless expense upon the Government.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state for the information of the gentleman that from the foundation of the Government these claims have been indexed every ten years.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For what purpose?

Mr. BINGHAM. This index runs up already to the Fifty-first Congress. This is a proposition to carry it on to the Fifty-seventh Congress. The Senate has such an index prepared for that body—the same character of index for which we ask the House now to appropriate.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand; but the mere fact that it has been the practice of this House to print this index, which serves no useful purpose, is no reason why at this session of the Fifty-seventh Congress we should continue the pernicious practice.

Mr. BINGHAM. Of course that is a matter for the judgment of the House.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I ask a question which I should very much like to have the chairman of the committee answer: What purpose is this index to serve? The mere fact that it has been printed in the past is no reason why it should be printed now, if we can save this needless expense.

Mr. BINGHAM. According to the information which I now receive this index is a matter of constant reference; and the subordinate officers of the House, who have charge of the matter, make the unqualified declaration that they could not do the business of their offices without being in possession of this index.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that the only claims that can come up for consideration in this Congress are those which have been introduced in the shape of bills either at this session or the last?

Mr. BINGHAM. Without doubt, a claim not acted upon in one Congress must die unless it be introduced at the succeeding Congress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then what purpose can be served by having an index of the private bills introduced in the five previous Congresses, when those bills unless passed by Congress are dead?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] will permit me, I should like to make a suggestion, which I think will throw some light on the question raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE]. During this session of Congress I have had occasion to use some papers that had been used in connection with a bill introduced as far back as the Forty-fifth Congress. I endeavored the best I could to find them, and finally, after exhausting all the skill that I possessed in trying to find them, I went to the clerk of the file room and told him about the case, and asked him to find the papers. By reference to this index he was able to find them very readily. Now, it frequently happens that we want to secure the papers that were used in a Congress many years ago, for use in this or some future Congress, perhaps. We can get at those papers only by use of this index.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Calling the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the Committee on Claims gets very little opportunity indeed to pass any claims, however meritorious, I would ask what good purpose the information would serve.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Well, I will say that it gave me possession of the papers and enabled me to form an opinion as to the justice of this claim and to determine whether I would reintroduce the bill or not.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Then is it not a fact that after the bill was introduced, and after the committee gave careful consideration to the bill, it could not be passed because the rules of this House precluded the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I do not care to discuss that phase of the question with the gentleman from New York. I agree that the rules of the House are not what they ought to be. I agree to that proposition, but I do see a good purpose to be served in carrying down this index.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BINGHAM. With pleasure.

Mr. CLARK. These men getting up this index are paid $4,800 a year, are they not?

Mr. BINGHAM. In all, three clerks, at $1,600 each.

Mr. CLARK. That means per year?

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, that means the current year.

Mr. CLARK. How long have they been working at this herculean job?

Mr. BINGHAM. Commencing in April, under the current law.

Mr. CLARK. Now, this is simply to collate a digest of claims which have been introduced here since the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. BINGHAM. The book of claims is completed up to the Fifty-first Congress. The Senate, on their side, have completed it up to date. This completes it from the Fifty-first to the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Why, Mr. Chairman, I undertake to say that if this index is desirable, and I have no doubt it is, there are plenty of clerks lying around Washington who can make that complete index from the beginning of the Fifty-first Congress down to the present date in six months.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In less time than that.

Mr. CLARK. And here we are appropriating $4,800 a year for a thing which my secretary can do in six months, and I would be willing to risk my head on the proposition.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And the gentleman would not lose.

Mr. CLARK. I object to that item in this bill. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that section by cutting the amount down to $1,200.

The CHAIRMAN. A point of order was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, pending the point of order. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether there is any duplication by reason of this provision and the one upon page 15 providing for a digest of the claims.

Mr. BINGHAM. Page 15 of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Page 15 of the bill. A clerk is there provided for at $2,000 a year to continue a digest of claims. It is in line 5, on page 15 of the bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state that there is no relation whatever in their lines of work.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what good object is to be subserved by having one set of clerks prepare an index of claims and another set prepare a digest of claims?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that if he will wait until we come to that I will have the matter looked up. We will have it looked up before we get to that paragraph.

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, that is not a very satisfactory reason for withdrawing a point of order on the present paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. All I can say to the gentleman is that we have followed the current law with reference to this appropriation, and that if, when we come to the paragraph which the gentleman has reference to, it becomes evident that there is a duplication of work, your committee will make the correction. Or, if the gentleman desires, I will ask that this be passed over and the reading of the bill continued.

Mr. MANN. I do not desire that. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania state, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, which pays considerable attention to the matter of claims, that the making of this digested summary and alphabetical list of private claims is necessary in order that a proper understanding may be had, at any time, of any claim?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the understanding of the committee as to the usefulness of the book.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that this is a mere index, or is it in a sense a history of the claims which have been presented?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; and I have asked the Clerk to find those papers.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri renews the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. I will withdraw the point of order if they will agree to cut this down to $1,200.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Committee on Appropriations have no bargains to make about the matter.

Mr. CLARK. All right; I insist on the point of order then.

Mr. HEMENWAY. This item seems to be necessary, for the benefit of the members of the House, and if the gentleman from Missouri wants to take the responsibility of cutting it out by a point of order, if the Chair sees fit to sustain him, I suppose he has the right to do it. But before the Chair rules, of course the committee would like to be heard on the question whether it is subject to a point of order or not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I should like to ask the gentleman a question about this matter.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am very clear that the item is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if the purpose of this paragraph is to print a bill, say, of the Fifty-fifth Congress, that was reintroduced in the Fifty-sixth Congress?

Mr. BINGHAM. It has nothing to do with the printing of bills.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Well, then, will the index include a bill, say, introduced in the Fifty-fifth Congress and introduced again in the Fifty-sixth Congress? If the bill is indexed when the bill is printed, of course the bill thus duplicated under this provision would naturally be printed. There is no necessity for that, I think.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would say to the gentleman that as I understand the value of the index, it gives the sequence or history of every claim introduced and becomes most valuable for reference.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I understand that.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the clerk in that division makes the statement to the committee that he could not conduct the work of his office unless he had that aid beforehand. It has been so recognized as a necessary piece of legislation by both the Senate and the House.

One step further, if the gentleman will permit me. This is a continuing appropriation under current law, and the work must be completed before July 30, 1904. We are just continuing in this bill the making of the appropriation to carry out the enactment of current law.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I wish the gentleman to reply to this proposition——

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state to the gentleman that the point of order is pending, and we are going into the merits of the legislation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have the floor and I should like to finish my inquiry before I conclude the matter, and I can do it in a moment.

The purpose of this provision, as I understand it, is first to print an index. Am I correct in that?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is right.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, that is an index to the bills?

Mr. BINGHAM. From the Fifty-first to the present Congress.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Of all the bills?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. All claims.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, is it intended that with this index all these bills shall be printed? I do not see any use in reprinting a bill that has already been printed.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is simply an index. It does not print the bills.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And it is an index alone that is intended?

Mr. BINGHAM. And the index is to be completed from the Fifty-first to the present Congress.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want the gentleman from New York to understand that this is simply a matter which refers to claims and not bills.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand that.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman from Tennessee was talking about bills all the time.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. With all due respect to the gentleman from Georgia, I think I talked about the index some.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, this matter was very thoroughly thrashed over in the House at the time the amendment was originally made in regard to this index. Under the present conditions a Senator has the opportunity, when a bill is presented, to trace the history of that bill as far as it goes. By a full and complete index up to date we could ascertain the history of the claim and ascertain whether any part of it has been allowed or whether the bill has come up a second time for a second allowance.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman pardon a question?

Mr. LACEY. One moment. Now, it was found in the House very difficult to combat various claims that were presented that came up a second, a third, a fourth, fifth, and sixth time in Congress. You could go back of the Fifty-first Congress and trace the history of every claim—such as the French spoliation claims and any old claim—but in the case of any new claim or an old claim revived we could not have their history traced because of the absence of an index for the last ten years in the House. After a full explanation the provision was made, and the law authorized the employment of three clerks to make this index. They are at work upon it. They have worked on it for six months. This is a proposition to continue that work—to continue it for another year, and by that time the index can be brought up to date, and if it is not desired then it can be discontinued. It is authorized by law. The point of order would not lie against it; and even if it were not authorized by law there should be a law so that the House should have access to its own records to protect itself from the duplication of claims and their repayment. This index does prevent the second allowance or the additional allowance of claims growing out of the same transaction.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that it is necessary to have such an index, a proposition I deny, do you not think that $4,800 is an extravagant sum to pay to index the private claim bills introduced in the last five Congresses?

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman must concede the magnitude and numbers of the claims that are presented to this Government. He must concede the fact that every bill ever introduced setting up a claim against the Government and not allowed comes up again and again in the same form or in a different form, or in the name of an assignee perhaps, or the name of an heir, and after having been thoroughly talked down on the floor of the House and fully discussed and understood by the House it comes up again in a different form, and can not be met under the existing conditions because of the absence of any index that will enable a vigilant gentleman like my friend from New York to examine these questions.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. May I interrupt you?

Mr. LACEY. One moment. But under the present proposition, with an index, if a claim comes up on the floor that my friend thinks is of doubtful character, he looks it over in a hurry. He wants to inform himself upon it, and without an index he can go down among the files and in about eight weeks' time perhaps learn all about it, but with an index he can do it in five minutes and ascertain everything that he has done about that claim, or he can have his clerk get it for him in a few minutes. He can do it now with all claims up to the Fifty-first Congress, and from that time to the present time that can be done in the Senate, but the House since 1889 has no means by which members can inform themselves, and therefore this index is absolutely essential in order that the House may protect itself against duplication in the presentation of claims. It is a saving of money. It is not a question of $1,600 a year.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Forty-eight hundred.

Mr. LACEY. No; not $4,800. This is the proposition. There are three of these clerks. Three of them necessarily can do the work in one-third of the time that one will do it; so it is not a question of $4,800. If we had six clerks they could do it in one-sixth of the time. I think it might be well to made it six clerks instead of three.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. They could do all this work in three months if they worked diligently.

Mr. LACEY. Not all are so rapid as my friend from New York.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am on the Committee on Claims and thoroughly familiar with the work before that committee, and thoroughly familiar with the work of each individual member of the committee, too, and I know that no member of the committee has the slightest difficulty in tracing the history of any claims presented before that committee.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired, and the Chair is ready to rule.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question for information.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. You say that this appropriation item is now existing law. Now, is there any law for it except the last appropriation bill?

Mr. LACEY. That is an existing law.

Mr. CLARK. That ends with this Congress.

Mr. LACEY. It creates the position.

Mr. CLARK. If that is true, you could go on appropriating for these fellows until the crack of doom.

Mr. LACEY. This is a continuation of a work now begun. The last Congress started this work by making the appropriation, and if this appropriation is not continued the work done under the appropriation of the last Congress will be lost. The work done thus far by these clerks is incomplete. Unless we have it brought up to date we will lose the benefit of the work already done. Now, an appropriation for the continuation of a work now commenced is not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, it is for the convenience of the House, and the same law exists for it that it does for the appropriation for pages. Now, these claims are over in the file room, and they have their place. If I want to see one of them, as I sometimes do, two or three Congresses ago, I must go to the file clerk to find it. If the file clerk did not have an index of some kind, he would have great difficulty in keeping his office in due shape. Its usefulness in a general way was well expressed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]. We might possibly go without the information; but if so, it would be to the disadvantage, inconvenience, and I might say the safety of members. If the gentleman will take the index and examine it, he will see that it requires much care to make it useful.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask the gentleman a question. Does he contend that because this item was in the last appropriation bill it is existing law and would authorize the Chairman to overrule the point of order?

Mr. CANNON. I do not put it on that ground. I put it on the same ground that I would if the gentleman rose in his place and offered an appropriation for an additional page.

Mr. CLARK. The gentleman is arguing the merits of the case.

Mr. CANNON. No, I am not.

Mr. CLARK. I am arguing the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. And I am arguing the point of order.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Do I understand the gentleman from Illinois simply to discuss the point of order, or is he arguing that the contemplated expenditure is reasonable?

Mr. CANNON. I am trying to answer my friend from Missouri about the point of order. I think it is in order.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, with reference to the point of order, this bill for the next fiscal year carries out the requirements of the existing order of legislation. It reads as follows in the current law:

To enable the Clerk of the House to prepare and complete a digestive summary and alphabetical list of private claims presented to the House of Representatives from the Fifty-second to the Fifty-seventh Congress, inclusive, three clerks, at $1,600 each, during the fiscal year 1902; in all, $4,800. And said work shall be completed and ready to be printed on or before July 30, 1904.

The paragraph of this bill follows exactly the direction of the existing statute.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CAPRON). The Chair finds that the statutes on page 582 are exactly as have been read by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and that under Rule XXI of the House this is clearly a continuation of a public work already in progress, and hence the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that paragraph by substituting thirty-two hundred dollars for forty-eight hundred dollars.

Mr. LACEY. And to that I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point of order against the proposed amendment.

Mr. CLARK. What is the point of order?

Mr. LACEY. That the $4,800 is fixed by existing law by the last Congress.

Mr. CLARK. In an appropriation bill.

Mr. LACEY. It makes no difference whether it is in an appropriation bill or not, it is the law of the land.

Mr. CLARK. It is against the rules of the House to move to increase an appropriation, but it is not against them to cut one down.

Mr. LACEY. The Holman rule, to which the gentleman refers, is not in force now.

Mr. CLARK. When was it repealed?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, before the gentleman came into Congress.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, is it not true that we refused to pay the Civil Service Commission anything at all at one session of Congress? This House refused to pay them anything. You can make any reduction you please, but you can not increase one. Now, while I am on my feet, I wish to ask the Chairman this question. I am not sure that I understand this feature of the bill. My impression is that the words "private claims" are used to include the claims now presented to the War Claims Committee, the Claims Committee, the Pensions Committee, and the Invalid Pensions Committee. If that be true it includes a large number of items. If it only includes claims, such as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] seems to understand, why, it does not amount to a large number of cases, and it is not much of a task to make the index. But if it includes all the claims presented to the four committees I have mentioned, it amounts to about 10,000 claims presented to each Congress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand it only includes private claims.

Mr. LLOYD. That would include claims presented to the four committees I have mentioned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will overrule the point of order.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that this work is incomplete. If the members of Congress intend to have an index in time, or anything like a reasonable time, you will allow the three clerks to complete it. If three clerks are to be employed, $1,600 a year for that kind of work is a reasonable price, and it ought not to be cut down.

Mr. MADDOX. Are there three clerks now engaged in this business?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This proposes three.

Mr. MADDOX. How many are now engaged?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am answering only one question. This bill proposes three. How many have been employed in the past I do not recollect.

Several MEMBERS. Three.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. That is my recollection—that three have been employed.

Mr. MADDOX. Then three have been employed heretofore. It is proposed now to employ three more.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; this is simply a continuation of the service.

Mr. MADDOX. The proposition is to continue in office the same three?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. So I understand.

Mr. MADDOX. Then the gentleman might have answered my question before.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. This is a business proposition which looks to the convenience of the House. It proposes to facilitate the business of every man who wants to know anything about an old claim, whether in the Fifty-second, the Fifty-third, the Fifty-fourth, the Fifty-fifth, the Fifty-sixth, or the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The trouble is that we can not have these claims considered, whether they are old or new.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman said a moment ago that he was perfectly familiar with this matter of private claims before the House. I guarantee that he does not know anything about one in a thousand of these claims; and he knows he does not.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman is in error; I am on that committee.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. If you mean that you know about the private claims pending in this Congress in which you are serving, you may be right; but the gentleman must remember that there is no possibility of his knowing about claims pending in previous Congresses except by means of an index, such as we are now proposing.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman means claims never considered.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I repeat that this is simply a question of convenience for the House. If you want to have this index brought up promptly you want to continue the employment of these three men; but if you want the work prolonged for one, two, or three years, then vote against this proposition and string out this work indefinitely. That is all there is in the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] to amend the appropriation in the pending item by changing $4,800 to $3,200.

The question being taken, there were on a division—ayes 30, noes 50.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Clerks and messengers to committees: For clerk to the Committee on Ways and Means, $3,000; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000; messenger, $1,200; janitor, $720; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $3,000; assistant clerk and stenographer, $2,000; messenger and assistant clerk, $1,200; janitor, $720; clerks to Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections, Foreign Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Indian Affairs, Insular Affairs, Invalid Pensions, Judiciary, Library, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Pensions, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Printing, Public Buildings and Grounds, Public Lands, Rivers and Harbors, Revision of the Laws, War Claims, and clerk to continue Digest of Claims under resolution of March 7, 1888, at $2,000 each; assistant clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $1,200; for janitors for rooms of the Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections, Foreign Affairs, Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Indian Affairs, Insular Affairs, Invalid Pensions, Judiciary, Library, Merchant Marine and Fisheries, Military Affairs, Naval Affairs, Post-Office and Post-Roads, Pensions, Printing, Public Buildings and Grounds, Public Lands, Rivers and Harbors, and War Claims, at $720 each, and said janitors shall be appointed by the chairmen, respectively, of said committees, and shall perform all of the duties heretofore required of messengers detailed to said committees by the Doorkeeper; in all, $31,600.

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer the amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24 of page 14 insert after the word "Elections" the words "Numbers One and Two."

Mr. BINGHAM. What is the purpose of this amendment?

Mr. OLMSTED. The bill as it now reads provides for a clerk to the Committee on Elections. It does not specify how many Committees on Elections. A similar provision was made in the bill one year ago; and that clerk was allotted—in fact, sent without any discussion—to the Committee on Elections No. 1. The result was that when the Elections Committee No. 2 met at the beginning of this Congress it had no clerk, it had no janitor, it had no assistants whatever, so that the chairman himself personally employed a janitor and a clerk. Afterwards, two or three months having elapsed, appropriate resolutions were adopted by the House, so that that committee now has a clerk and a janitor, but only for the current year.

Now, this bill makes appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and unless the amendment I propose be inserted, this committee will meet at the next Congress with no clerk, no janitor, and no assistants whatever, which will be very unfair to the committee. I do not know whether I shall be upon the committee, but I know what assistance is required by the committee; and the minority members on the committee will all agree with me, as I hope the Committee of the Whole will, as to the propriety of the amendment I have offered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire, in view of the gentleman's statement, to resist his proposition.

Mr. CLARK. I think we had better consolidate these three Committees on Elections than give this extra clerk.

Mr. OLMSTED. Then I hope the gentleman from Missouri will be made chairman of that consolidated committee.

Mr. CLARK. I will very cheerfully accept that office in the next Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. DRISCOLL. As a member of Elections Committee No. 3, I suggest that similar provision be made for that committee. I offer an amendment to that effect.

Mr. BINGHAM. I think the whole proposition had better go to the Committee of the Whole to be determined as it may deem best. I make no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL] will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by adding "and No. 3;" so as to make the clause read "Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3."

Mr. CLARK. I make a point of order against that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that it is competent for the committee to determine, by the addition of certain words, what it means in further explanation of the paragraph, and that the addition of the words "One, Two, and Three" is merely explanatory. The point of order is therefore overruled.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment on page 15 of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman that there is an amendment already pending. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, do I understand from the ruling of the Chair that there will be only one clerk? Will there be but one clerk for the Committees on Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3, or will the adoption of this amendment add two clerks?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will request that the amendment to the amendment be read.

Mr. CLARK. If the Chair rules these words ought to be inserted to enable the Committee on Appropriations to determine what it means, then I suggest that we adopt another amendment to find out what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] means. Does the gentleman mean three clerks or one clerk?

Mr. OLMSTED. I mean just what we have now, one clerk for each committee, but I want it settled at this time, instead of having it come in from the Committee on Accounts by special resolution after Congress has been in session three or four months, and the committee working without any clerk or janitor meantime.

Mr. BINGHAM. As I understand the proposition, there are at present existing three Committees on Elections.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is right.

Mr. BINGHAM. Each committee has a clerk at $6 a day during the sessions of Congress. Is it for the next fiscal year that the Committees on Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3 are to have a $2,000 clerk? Is that the proposition as amended?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is the proposition before the House, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is this other clerk kept at $6 a day?

Mr. BINGHAM. No; we will strike that provision out when we come to that paragraph.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is not that the creation of two new offices by an appropriation bill?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The offices already being filled with incumbents at the present time, the Chair thinks it could hardly be so considered.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that it is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already ruled on that point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. I call for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DRISCOLL].

Mr. OLMSTED. I will accept that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment is accepted, so that if the amendment is adopted the paragraph will read as follows:

Clerks to Committees on Accounts, Agriculture, Banking and Currency, Claims, District of Columbia, Elections Nos. 1, 2, and 3.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is correct.

Mr. LLOYD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether it is not true that Elections Committees 2 and 3 now have a session clerk?

Mr. OLMSTED. They each have a session clerk, but provision for that clerk runs out with the current year.

Mr. LLOYD. I understand that if this amendment becomes law, then there will be a permanent clerk for each committee.

Mr. OLMSTED. For one year.

Mr. LLOYD. Prior to this time we have had only one clerk, and that was for Elections Committee No. 1.

Mr. OLMSTED. And two session clerks.

Mr. LLOYD. And the session clerks belonged to Elections Committees 1 and 2.

Mr. OLMSTED. There is no great difference in the expense, but the difference is that the committee, when it meets, will have the assistance at its first meeting.

Mr. LLOYD. Is it not true that the session clerks are provided for on page 16 of the bill, at the top of the page?

Mr. BINGHAM. If they are, that will be stricken out when we come to it.

Mr. LLOYD. It is the purpose of the gentleman to have it stricken out?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly. Instead of a session clerk, the gentleman asks for an annual clerk.

Mr. LLOYD. I understand that.

Mr. BINGHAM. At a fixed compensation of $2,000, which runs for the next fiscal year. We will strike out, when we come to the paragraph, the session clerks, so as to make the bill consistent with the action of the House, whatever it may be at this time.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I should like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the digest of claims referred to in line 5 of page 15, for which $2,000 is to be appropriated, is not the same digest for the preparation of which we appropriated $4,800 a few moments ago?

Mr. BINGHAM. I think we had better wait until we dispose of this question that is now pending. Then we will come to that paragraph. There is no disposition on the part of the committee to evade its responsibility.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I thought the other matter was disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLMSTED. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by inserting in line 11, page 15, after the word "Elections," the words "One, Two, and Three."

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask the Committee on Elections—the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED]—do your three committees have independent committee rooms?

Mr. OLMSTED. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Separate rooms?

Mr. OLMSTED. Oh, yes.

The amendment of Mr. OLMSTED was agreed to.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out lines 5 and 6 and the word "eight" in line 7.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, I find that in lines 5 and 6 a clerk is provided to prepare a digest of claims, at $2,000 per annum. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the digest of claims referred to in this paragraph is not the digest for the preparation of which we voted $4,800 a few moments ago?

Mr. BINGHAM. Before making any remark upon the subject, I should prefer to call upon the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON], who is a member of the Committee on War Claims, to make answer to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. GIBSON. I am a member of the War Claims Committee and am familiar with the duties of this clerk. He has been in the employment of the committee ever since I have been a member of it—for four Congresses now—and his services are absolutely indispensable to the business of that committee.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. By whom is he appointed?

Mr. GIBSON. I know nothing about that. He is there.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is he preparing this digest of claims?

Mr. GIBSON. He keeps up a continuous account of all claims presented to Congress growing out of the war of the rebellion and all other wars.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Why, Mr. Chairman, that is precisely what we voted $4,800 for a few moments ago.

Mr. GIBSON. I want the gentleman to hear what I have to say. I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. GIBSON. I do not, because I have not finished my remarks.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I asked the gentleman a question. I do not wish him to consume my five minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. I claim the floor. The floor has been yielded to me.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have the right to the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. GAINES of Tennesee. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York has the floor. He asked the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] a question, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania asked the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] to answer it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have the right to the floor under the rules.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York wish to have the gentleman from Tennessee continue his explanation?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. No.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Chair will hear me a moment, the gentleman from New York addressed to me an inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] is recognized.

Mr. BINGHAM. I asked that the gentleman from Tennessee, a member of the Committee on War Claims, might first make his statement in answer to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE].

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And the gentleman proposes to make a speech and to consume my five minutes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope not. I hardly think a speech is necessary.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not think so, either.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Tennessee took the floor in order to reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York to myself.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I asked a question as to who appointed this clerk, and the gentleman from Tennessee said he did not know. Now, I want to say that we voted $4,800 a few moments ago to pay the salaries of clerks to prepare a digest of claims introduced in the Fifty-second, Fifty-third, Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth, and Fifty-seventh Congresses. And now with this paragraph is a provision to pay a clerk for continuing a digest of claims, practically the same thing—I assume it to be the same thing unless it is positively contradicted. In other words, after having $4,800 in one paragraph for preparing a digest of claims, we find that another clerk is provided for at $2,000 to continue a digest of claims. It is the same work. I do not know how many clerks are now employed to do this work which could be done in three months.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman states it is the same work.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I assume it to be.

Mr. HEMENWAY. You assume it? Does not the gentleman know that a few minutes ago the gentleman from Tennessee said that it is not the same work?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the difference?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Tennessee will explain to him fully just what work it is.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. If it is not the same work it ought to be thoroughly shown. We have made a provision by which we pay $4,800 for preparing a digest of claims, and now it is proposed to pay $2,000 to continue a digest of claims.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will see on page 13 the matter he alludes to as passed by the committee is private claims, whereas this digest is war claims.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. It does not so say. Where does it say war claims?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It says digest of claims on page 15. That is so.

Mr. McCLEARY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. McCLEARY. Does he recognize the difference between index and digest?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do; and if $4,800 is to be paid for preparing a proper digest for the Committee on Claims, I can take his clerk and prepare it in three months.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand that the gentleman from Tennessee, who has taken his seat, has stated——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. I will state to the gentleman from New York and the House generally that there are about 3,000 bills filed before the Committee on War Claims at each Congress, covering from three to ten millions of dollars. In the last session we passed a bill for three millions; in the Congress before the last we passed a bill for over $3,000,000 of war claims. These claims date back to the war of the rebellion and to the war with England. Now the Spanish-American war claims are coming in, and all sorts of war claims are coming in, and it is impossible for the members of the committee, especially new members of the committee, to keep informed as to these claims. Many of them have been filed Congress after Congress ever since 1868, and unless we have an expert man there, an experienced man, it is highly probable that the same claim will be paid two or three times. It often happens that the same claim is presented long after it has been paid, sometimes twenty years after it has been paid. In the last Congress three claims, after they had been approved, were found to have been paid.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Could not that have been ascertained readily?

Mr. GIBSON. They were found out to have been already paid; and it is absolutely necessary for the committee to have somebody to whom members can go for intelligent information in reference to the history of these large claims, and know what has been the action of former Congresses, whether they were recommended by the committee or turned down by the committee; and it is necessary to have a digest of every one of these claims in order that we may know what has been the history of that particular claim from the time the bill was first introduced to the present, some of them perhaps introduced twenty years before.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Are the claims referred to in this item war claims?

Mr. GIBSON. They are claims arising out of the war of the rebellion and the war with Spain; also the last war with England.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Upon the statement of the gentleman, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. The Congress before last had claims before it that went back so far as the war of 1812 with Great Britain, and some of these claims would be paid several times unless the Government were furnished with expert information on the subject.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman's explanation is entirely satisfactory and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman inform me who at the present time is the clerk of the War Claims Committee?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Holloway.

Mr. LLOYD. Who is the clerk that makes the digest?

Mr. GIBSON. The gentleman referred to, Mr. Holloway, is the expert clerk of the War Claims Committee and makes this digest of the claims referred to on page 15.

Mr. LLOYD. Who is the clerk that is provided for at the end of line 4?

Mr. GIBSON. That is the ordinary committee clerk.

Mr. LLOYD. Who is he?

Mr. GIBSON (continuing). Just as other important committees have clerks.

Mr. LLOYD. Who is he?

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Frye.

Mr. LLOYD. And who is the assistant that is provided for there?

Mr. GIBSON. I will state to the gentleman frankly that I transact all my business with the expert clerk, Mr. Holloway.

Mr. LLOYD. The reason I asked the question was that I have considerable business at that office, and I have never met anyone except the expert clerk. He is a very efficient man, and I was surprised to find that that committee had three clerks. The bill provides for three clerks, and, so far as I know, there is only one there, and for that reason I asked the question as to who they were.

Mr. GIBSON. We have the three clerks. They perform the ordinary clerical duties, keep up the docket, prepare reports, and assist in the other duties as called upon by the chairman and the individual members of the committee. I find them at work there, and they are at work there now.

Mr. LLOYD. All three of them?

Mr. GIBSON. All three of them at work.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "Claims," line 4, page 15, insert "Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures."

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures have on several occasions passed a resolution asking the Appropriations Committee to appropriate for a clerk for that committee. My information is that the Committee on Accounts has favorably passed upon a proposition of this kind. I do not know that any report has been made to the House, but this committee has a good deal of work to do. I know it has a good deal more work to do than many of the committees that have annual clerks. We have now a session clerk, and it seems to me fair that this committee should be provided with an annual clerk.

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on the point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; that it changes existing law.

Mr. SOUTHARD. All I need to do, Mr. Chairman, is to refer the Chair to the ruling just made on the amendment which provided for the clerk for the Committees on Elections 1 and 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair knows of no legislation providing for this clerk, and therefore holds that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. SOUTHARD. It seems to me that that is in direct contravention of the other ruling.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask unanimous consent, when we get through the bill, that the totals may be allowed to be corrected. As we go along it is difficult to make the tabulations, but at the close of the bill there will be no trouble in making the corrections made necessary by the amendments as we go along.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what these 15 clerks are for that are mentioned on page 16?

Mr. BINGHAM. Right here, Mr. Chairman, is a paragraph where a correction ought to be made and changed in accordance with an amendment that has already been adopted. The word "fifteen" should be changed to "thirteen," so it may read "thirteen clerks in committees."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I will yield for that purpose, Mr. Chairman.

The amendment of Mr. BINGHAM was agreed to.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman what committees these 13 clerks are for?

Mr. HEMENWAY. They are designated by the Committee on Accounts at the opening of the session.

Mr. BINGHAM. They are assigned at the commencement of the session of Congress. We provide in the present bill for this number of clerks, and then the Committee on Accounts will come in and make the assignment.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I want to make certain about the matter. Does the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings have one of these clerks?

Mr. BINGHAM. No.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department?

Mr. BINGHAM. No.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. The Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department?

Mr. BINGHAM. Those committees have a room, but no clerk.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. If I remember correctly, they were provided with clerks the first part of the session, but none of those committees have had meetings.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think the gentleman is mistaken about those committees being provided with clerks.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. As it happens, I had the distinguished honor of being placed on the important committee known as the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department. If that committee has ever met it has not met at this Capitol. I think it has been provided with a clerk.

Mr. BINGHAM. No; none of the committees on expenditures in the various Departments have a clerk.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. What committees do have these clerks?

Mr. BINGHAM. The large committees of the House that have consideration of legislation and committees that have regular meetings.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Is there a single committee of the thirteen that have met? If so, name it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Committee on Territories; Coinage, Weights, and Measures——

Mr. BINGHAM. The legislative committees of the House that have charge of legislation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will take the time to read the resolution of the Committee on Accounts, assigning these clerks, he can see just where they are assigned.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I think I am posted in regard to that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then the gentleman can give us the information he is seeking.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. My information is that the 13 positions named here in the bill as amended must be of clerks of committees of this House. If you will take the list of committees named on page 25 you will find that there are not 15 other committees left, unless you include these committees on expenditures of the different Departments.

Mr. BINGHAM. Oh, no.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will take the report of the Committee on Accounts made at the beginning of the session, he will see what committees these clerks are assigned to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Allow me to make a statement. All of what are called the important committees of the House have clerks assigned to them. A large body of the committees have annual clerks, at $2,000 a year. The other important committees, heretofore numbering 15, are now, under an amendment of the House, reduced to 13, because we have given annual clerks to two of the Committees on Elections.

At the first session of the next Congress the Committee on Accounts will bring in their resolution, making the designation, under this paragraph of the appropriation bill, of the committees that are to have clerks. We have simply followed the designation of those committees in this bill, so that we can appropriate for them for the next Congress. As a Committee on Appropriations we have simply followed the action of the House in the assignment of this number of clerks at $6 a day during the session.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I understand that. Now, why do you not name those committees in the bill, as the other committees are named?

Mr. BINGHAM. Simply because it is the custom or practice to have the provision framed in this way. Conditions may exist in consequence of which some of these committees may not need a clerk; or, under the rules of the House, additional committees may be appointed; or, under the rules, some committees may be wiped out. Unless there is an assignment by action of the House through the Committee on Accounts so as to allow this, that, or the other committee to have a clerk at $6 a day, this expenditure can not be made. The House at the first session of the next Congress must designate what committees shall be entitled to clerks.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. Mr. Chairman, it has been stated that this list of 13 clerks includes no clerk to the committees on expenditures of the various Departments. Now, to guard against any mistake in reference to that matter, I move to amend the bill on page 16 by adding after the word "dollars," in line 3, a provision to this effect.

This appropriation shall not apply to clerks for the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Agriculture, the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Navy Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-Office Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, and the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings.

Mr. BINGHAM. I make a point of order that that is new legislation.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I believe I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] yield?

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. No, sir; I do not yield; but if the gentleman makes the point of order——

Mr. BINGHAM. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RANDELL] has expired.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. I am offering an amendment, and it seems to me I am entitled to five minutes to discuss it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But the gentleman can not proceed to speak upon an amendment when a point of order is made upon the amendment. The first question is upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. I will reserve the point, in order that the gentleman may have an opportunity for the expression of his views.

Mr. RANDELL of Texas. It is stated here by the gentleman in charge of this bill that this list of 13 committees entitled to clerks does not include the committees on expenditures in the various Departments. Hence, if my amendment be adopted, it will not interfere with that provision for those 13 committees, but it will guard against the mistake of appropriating $6 a day for these 10 committees, which, it is admitted, are not intended to be included.

I insist that if the provision for clerks of committees that are actually doing work is proper, then we should not make the mistake of allowing this money to be paid for clerkships of committees that never meet, that have no clerks except in name—clerks that simply draw $6 a day with nothing whatever to do; clerks that are in fact not in existence, except for the purpose of drawing their salaries.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I just want to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that there are 61 committees, and that only 38 of them are provided with clerks, either session or annual; that 23 of the committees of the House are not provided with clerks of any kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will permit me, I will state to my friend from Texas that if he will look on page 206 of the Directory he will find the list of committees that have clerks, and he will find that no one of the exceptions named by himself in his proposed amendment has a clerk.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And has not had for years.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; I think not. On page 206 of the Directory the gentleman will find a list of committees that have clerks, and of the committees named by him not one has a clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. I simply make the point of order that it is new legislation and changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

For stationery for members of the House of Representatives, including $5,000 for stationery for the use of the committees and officers of the House, $53,625.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 15 and 16, on page 22, strike out the words "fifty-three thousand six hundred and twenty-five," and insert the words "one hundred and ninety-nine thousand five hundred."

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, the object of that amendment is to increase the allowance to Members and Delegates for stationery and postage from $125 a year to $500 a year. I believe it is the experience of every member of the House that his legitimate expenses in the way of printing, stationery, and postage equal at least $500 a year. Five hundred dollars is less than the average. It is expected of every member of the House that he shall have certain printing done in the way of speeches for distribution in his district and possibly throughout other parts of the country. It is public work. The speeches are distributed for the purpose of conveying information to the people, and the expense ought not to be borne by the individual member.

I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that the public ought to pay the expenses of all of the speeches that any member of Congress may make and wish to have published. A reasonable limitation should be put upon it, and it is my judgment that an allowance of $500 would cover the expense of stationery and postage and a reasonable amount for printing for the purpose of disseminating information among the people of the country and particularly among our respective constituents. The emoluments of members of Congress, everybody knows, are not munificent, and I do not believe a single member ought to be required to pay out of his own purse, out of his own salary, any of the expenses that are legitimately and fairly chargeable to the public. This limitation is a reasonable one. Five hundred dollars a year will pay for postage and stationery and allow each member to cause to be printed a reasonable number of speeches and have them distributed throughout his district. I think the amendment ought to pass. I believe it is the judgment of every member of the House that it is not an unreasonable proposition, and I hope it will be supported.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, as this question in connection with the amendment pertains absolutely and wholly to the members of the House, I for one shall throw the responsibility upon the House and will not make the point of order against the proposition; but, speaking for myself, I can say that I regard the sum of $125 a year for stationery and postage, $250 for the Congress, as sufficient. It has heretofore been ample for me, and in fact I think I never used my $125. That is all I have to say. I have no disposition to raise the point of order, as it is a matter personal to the members.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order against this amendment. Does the gentleman from Indiana wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point that the point of order comes too late, being raised after the question has been debated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to hear the gentleman from Indiana on the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask as to a matter of parliamentary practice.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I insist that the point of order comes too late.

Mr. CLARK. I want to ask a question about that. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for instance, a member of the committee in charge of the bill, gets up here and notifies the committee that he reserves the point of order or makes a point of order, and then he gets up and withdraws the point, does that cut other people out from making it, too?

Mr. OLMSTED. The gentleman from Pennsylvania went on and discussed the merits of the amendment after withdrawing the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. That can always be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was properly made by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Do I understand that my point of order was in time or not?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. CLARK. Then I insist on it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I should like to ask a question for my own information and the information of the House. Is it not a fact that the amount, $125, is fixed by law?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is fixed by law.

Mr. BABCOCK. What difference, then, does it make whether we appropriate $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 in this bill? The amount would be the same, would it not, $125 allotted to each member, unless the statute is changed?

Mr. BINGHAM. It would be the same, unless the statute is changed.

Mr. BABCOCK. So that if we adopt the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] we would not increase the amount allowed to any member under the appropriation.

Mr. BINGHAM. We would increase the amount of the appropriation, but the statute would run.

Mr. BABCOCK. So that members would get only $125 each.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It would not be very difficult to amend the statute. If we make the appropriation, we will find a way to get the money.

Mr. BABCOCK. It seems to me we should amend the statute first.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses, namely: For stationery, postage, advertising, traveling expenses, horses and wagons, and miscellaneous expenses, $3,000.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to inquire if it is too late to amend the paragraph beginning with line 13 and ending with line 16.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to return to that paragraph?

Mr. CLARK, Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection——

Mr. CLARK. I ask unanimous consent to make an amendment for the convenience of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the committee will return to the paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. I reserve the right to object. What is the purpose of the gentleman?

Mr. CLARK. The purpose of the gentleman is this——

Mr. BINGHAM. Give me the line and page.

Mr. CLARK. Page 22, lines 13 to 16. I want to add these words:

That the superintendent of the stationery room shall be required to keep postage stamps for sale.

I will give you the reason for it.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. At what stage of the consideration of this proposition are we now? I want to make a point of order against the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. CLARK. Well, all right.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to returning to the paragraph?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The objection is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

Catalogue and shelf: For chief of division, $3,000; 5 assistants, at $1,800 each; 7 assistants, at $1,500 each; 6 assistants, at $1,400 each; 12 assistants, at $1,200 each; 6 assistants, at $1,000 each; 14 assistants, at $900 each; 4 assistants, at $800 each; 13 assistants, at $720 each; 3 assistants, at $600 each; 10 assistants, at $540 each; 4 assistants, at $480 each; 6 messengers, at $360 each; in all, $87,740.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I see there are a number of increases in this item for the Library of Congress. I would like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM] to explain them to us.

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no change in this paragraph. It is merely a reenactment of the current law.

Mr. MADDOX. The report says there are changes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not in the catalogue and shelf division. The changes come later.

Mr. BARTLETT. They are for the Library of Congress.

Mr. LITTAUER. There are four changes in the clerical force of the Library.

Mr. MADDOX. What are they?

Mr. LITTAUER. Two of them are stenographers.

Mr. MADDOX. The report here says seven.

Mr. LITTAUER. The gentleman is correct. The report states them exactly as they are.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman explain them?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I can take them all up together if the gentleman wishes.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to have you tell us why the changes are made.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Take the first item. One stenographer and typewriter, $1,000. That is for the office of the Librarian, where he claims he answers some 16,000 letters a year.

Mr. MADDOX. How many has he got already?

Mr. HEMENWAY. He has one.

Mr. MADDOX. Just one?

Mr. HEMENWAY. He has an enormous business, and he made it very clear that one stenographer is not able to do the work. The document division makes the same claim, and gives as a reason that the correspondence is enormous.

Mr. MADDOX. How many has the head of that division already?

Mr. HEMENWAY. He has none. In the copyright office the business has greatly increased and requires this increase of force. The business that is done in the copyright office is self-sustaining; in fact, not only self-sustaining, but the receipts of the copyright office are sufficient to employ a clerical force to bring up the arrears of work. On the next item of service, in connection with the distribution of card indexes, it is said that $4,500 is needed. The receipts from the sale of these cards must be covered into the Treasury, and last year they amounted to $8,000. Now, as to these other clerks, the clerks in the copyright office, where the business has so increased that they need an additional force, it is a self-sustaining office and to-day takes in more money than it costs to run it.

Mr. MADDOX. Has that fact been made to appear that it is really necessary to have this force, or do you take the statement of these people that they need the force?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, we investigate it as carefully as we can. Now, as to this item of $4,500, the Librarian makes these cards and sells them to other libraries—I think some 200 libraries now use them. Last year he received from this source over $8,000. The money is covered into the Treasury, and this $4,500 pays the expense. We have to appropriate, because the law requires him to cover into the Treasury the money that he receives for printing these cards.

Mr. BINGHAM. That covers all the gentleman desires?

Mr. MADDOX. I guess so.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maps and charts: For chief of division, $2,500; 1 assistant, $1,200, 2 assistants, at $900 each; 1 assistant, $720; 1 messenger boy, $360; in all, $6,580.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 19 and 20, page 26, by striking out "twenty-five hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "three thousand."

Mr. HEMENWAY. I reserve the point of order.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, the salaries which we have just allowed to the chief of each of the divisions of documents and manuscripts is $3,000. We allow the chief of the division of maps and charts, in the paragraph just read, $2,500. Now, I am not in favor of excessive salaries in any department of the Government; but I happen to know something about the duties of this particular chief of division, Mr. Phillips, and the highly intelligent and very successful and satisfactory manner in which he performs them, and the great usefulness of his work. The compilations that he has made of maps and charts of all parts of our possessions are of an inestimable value. I believe that his services are at least equally valuable to the Government as those of the chiefs of the two divisions I have mentioned. I hope, therefore, that the gentleman will not insist upon the point of order. Of course, I concede that if he does this amendment can not be submitted for the consideration of the committee. I trust the gentleman will not feel that his duty requires him to insist upon the point.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, this salary was increased $500 only a short time ago, and I insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order? The Chair wishes to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana whether this salary is fixed by law—if there is any statute fixing the salary?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not other than the appropriation bill, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. Other than the appropriation bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. And raising a salary would be changing the law, creating a new law, fixing the salary at a new amount, increasing the salary. It is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania wish to discuss the point of order?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania conceded the point of order well taken. Perhaps the Chair did not hear him?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not.

Mr. OLMSTED. I did say I conceded it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. OLMSTED. I conceded it, understanding that the salary was fixed by existing law. If I am mistaken I do not concede it. Personally, I do not concede that to fix in an appropriation bill for 1904 a larger salary than was allowed the same officer in a bill covering only the year 1903 is a violation of the rule. I must of course concede, however, that there have been rulings to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds the point well taken.

The Clerk read as follows:

Music: For chief of division, $2,000; one assistant, $1,400; one assistant, $1,000; two assistants, at $720 each; one messenger boy, $360; in all, $5,200.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know what this paragraph means. What sort of music is it we are paying for?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am free to confess that I do not know exactly whether it is rag time or classic; but we have over there a division of music.

Mr. MADDOX. Over here?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Over here at the Library; and these people who understand music seem to think it is of very great importance. I am free to confess that I can not tell whether it is or not. It is musical literature, and all music that is copyrighted has to be deposited there.

Mr. MADDOX. I did not know whether we had a hand organ over there or not. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I will state that of every piece of music that is copyrighted two copies are deposited in the Library, and they are filed and classified.

Mr. CLARK. That does not cost the Government anything, does it? The two copies are sent there free.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; it does not cost the Government anything.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Any books of a miscellaneous character no longer required for the use of such department, bureau, or commission, and not deemed an advisable addition to the Library of Congress, shall, if appropriate to the uses of the Free Public Library of the District of Columbia, be turned over to that library for general use as a part thereof. There may also be turned over to that library any books already in the Library of Congress which the Librarian of Congress deems unnecessary for further use therein.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the last four lines of that paragraph. It seems to me it is giving the Librarian of Congress a very wide discretion—authorizing him to turn over the books of any library that he may deem unnecessary.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think the gentleman misunderstands the language. It is to turn over to the Library of Congress.

Mr. McCALL. I am referring to the last three lines of this paragraph. It says: "There may also be turned over to that library any books already in the Library of Congress which the Librarian of Congress deems unnecessary for further use therein." I do not see why that does not include the whole collection.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that is the construction of it, I am perfectly willing that that part of it may be stricken out.

Mr. McCALL. I have every confidence in the present Librarian, but I think the language is too broad. It seems to me the point of order would be good, but I will move to strike out the last three lines.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order from line 25, on page 30, down to the end of line 8, on page 31, on the ground that it changes existing law. I do not think that any amendment would cure the defects in this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina makes the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I recognize that the gentleman's point of order would be sustained if he insists upon it, but on the merits of the proposition it was urgently pressed by the Librarian, and it simply takes the innumerable libraries, almost without limit in departments and bureaus in the Government service, where there is a large number of publications now in the department libraries, in a sense of no value to them, but would be of value in the great public library. It simply provides that when the head of a department consents to the transfer the Librarian of Congress may decide that the books shall go there.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania accept the proposed amendment by the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have already accepted the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FINLEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina withdraws his point of order. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts restate his amendment?

Mr. McCALL. On page 31, line 5, after the word "thereof," strike out the remainder of the line and lines 6, 7, and 8.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

BOTANIC GARDEN.

For superintendent, $1,800.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I suppose the words "superintendent of the Botanic Garden" refer to Mr. Smith. May I ask how long the salary has been running at $1,800?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am very sure long before I have any recollection.

Mr. MANN. I know very well that an amendment would be subject to a point of order and would not prevail, but I wish to urge upon the members of the Appropriations Committee that the next time they bring in a bill they increase that salary. Mr. Smith is one of the gentlemen of the country better posted on his subject than anybody over at the Congressional Library, where you pay them $2,500 or $3,000. They do not begin to have the comprehension of matters intrusted to their charge that Mr. Smith has of botanical questions. I would move to increase the salary myself, but the gentleman will raise the point of order.

Several MEMBERS. You had better try it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will say to the gentleman we have given to the Botanic Garden all that the excellent superintendent has asked for.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but this is for the superintendent himself, and because he is modest you have missed him.

Mr. McCALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he move to increase the salary.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the words "one thousand eight hundred" on page 33, line 2, and insert "twenty-four hundred."

Mr. BINGHAM. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. We have had no recommendation for such an increase.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows very well that I am not in the habit of urging an increase of salaries, but here is a man who is probably the most experienced tree man in this country. He ought to be paid a fairly reasonable salary. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can see that it is the desire of members of the House who come in contact with this gentleman that the point of order be not urged. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can afford to be generous as long as we are treating his amendments so generously by not urging points of order upon them.

Mr. BINGHAM. In deference to the wishes of the gentleman, I will let the House pass on the matter. I withdraw the point of order.

The question being taken, there were on a division (called for by Mr. BINGHAM)—ayes 18, noes 25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the following additional force rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain: Seven clerks of class 4; 13 clerks of class 3; 8 clerks of class 2; 30 clerks of class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 10 clerks, at $900 each; and 3 laborers; in all, $101,580.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I reserve a point of order on this paragraph. Inasmuch as the war with Spain has long since ended, and according to the reports of the public press and, I believe, the official reports, we have reduced the Army almost to the minimum, and are still further reducing it, I should like to know why we are to continue this "temporary" clerical force. This provision reads:

For continuing the following additional force rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain: Seven clerks of class 4, 13 clerks of class 3, 8 clerks of class 2, 30 clerks of class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 10 clerks, at $900 each, and 3 laborers; in all, $101,580.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any law——

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The gentleman will allow me to state that this provision is simply a continuation of the existing law; it does not provide anything new whatever.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not think there is any law for this, and I move to strike it out.

Mr. BINGHAM. Let me state to the gentleman that this paragraph is a reduction of the amount appropriated in the current law. If the gentleman will look on page 3 of the report he will find this statement:

Office of Auditor for the War Department.—A reduction is made of 1 clerk at $1,800, 4 clerks at $1,600 each, and 2 clerks at $1,400 each.

We found that the work there is decreasing, while in the Navy Department the Auditor's work is increasing; therefore, in the paragraph providing for the Auditor of the Navy Department, where there is an increasing amount of work, we have taken up, as you might say, the reduction in this appropriation for the War Department.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the necessity for this in the Treasury Department? It is based entirely upon the assumption that the war with Spain has not ended. If the war with Spain has in fact ended, what is the necessity for these extra employees?

Mr. BINGHAM. There is no increase in that paragraph; it is in fact a decrease.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. That may be true. I am only too glad to know that we can decrease these expenses a little somewhere in the civil departments. We have made reductions in the military department by reducing the Army almost to the minimum—from 100,000 to about 60,000—and we are still constantly reducing it, we are informed. Yet we are proposing to continue a temporary force—a force which was created temporarily, but which is now continued from year to year—without any legislation, too, I may add, because the last time this matter was up in the House we objected to it, and the Chair ruled that the point of order came too late. The committee did not object to it, although it was new legislation. The whole debate can be seen in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 7, 1902.

Now, here we have this condition of affairs: The war with Spain is at an end, the Army and the expenses of the Army have been and are being reduced, yet it is proposed to retain this temporary force of about 500 extra clerks that costs more than $600,000 a year. We have had these clerks since 1898, about that time—soon after the war with Spain begun. We have paid them already about $1,800,000. When will this stop? Not until we withdraw their pay and leaves. I oppose this paragraph as I have former similar sections, and shall continue to do so. The war with Spain is at an end. Their services can not be now needed.

Mr. BINGHAM. In dealing with this the committee felt that they were making as large a cut as was reasonable and fair with reference to the work that the Department is doing. The committee had no idea, and I do not think the gentleman from Tennessee has any purpose, to cripple the service of these Departments. We cut these expenditures; we cut them reasonably, not excessively.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I do not desire to cripple the public service, neither do I want such legislation as this to cripple the public revenues.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], to strike out the paragraph.

The question being taken,

The CHAIRMAN said: The "noes" seem to have it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I call for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 18, noes 32.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I make the point that no quorum is present.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the Committee of the Whole). There are 105 members present—a quorum. The "noes" have it; and the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is rejected.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDOX) there were—ayes 36, noes 48.

Mr. MADDOX. I demand tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were refused, 19 members, not a sufficient number, rising in support of the demand.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the following additional force rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain: Two clerks of class 3; 3 clerks of class 2; 4 clerks of class 1; 6 clerks, at $1,000 each; and 4 clerks, at $900 each; in all, $21,800.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MADDOX) there were—ayes 17, noes 40.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN (having counted the committee) announced 102 members, a quorum, present.

The Clerk read as follows:

Office of Auditor for Post-Office Department: For Auditor, $4,000; 2 Deputy Auditors, at $2,500 each; chief clerk, $2,000; law clerk, $2,000; 7 chiefs of division, at $2,000 each; 33 clerks of class 4; additional to 1 clerk as disbursing clerk, $450; 60 clerks of class 3; 81 clerks of class 2; 102 clerks of class 1; 87 clerks, at $1,000 each; skilled laborer, $1,000; 70 clerks, at $900 each; 25 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 6 messengers; 12 assistant messengers; 25 male laborers, at $660 each; 65 skilled laborers, at $660 each; 3 female laborers, at $660 each, and 15 charwomen; in all, $666,310.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MONDELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 16021) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, which was read, ordered printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee reserved all points of order on the bill.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Speaker, is it proper at this time to make a motion that that bill shall not be considered until two days after it has been printed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DALZELL). It would be a change of the rule. The gentleman can accomplish what he desires, however, by unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK. Then I ask unanimous consent that the bill just reported be not considered in the House until forty-eight hours after it has been printed.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that I would call the bill up on Monday if I could possibly do so without antagonizing the Committee on the District of Columbia. It is an urgent deficiency bill covering an item of twelve or thirteen hundred thousand dollars, and ought to be passed at the earliest possible moment. I do not want to grant unanimous consent, although I will say to the gentleman that I have no hope of calling it up until Monday. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. I would ask the gentleman from Illinois if there is any provision in this bill for deficiencies in the matter of the establishment of rural free delivery?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the truly rural is in there for half a million, and I know my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] does not want to wait a holy minute on that.

Mr. CLARK. I will vote enough right now to make the free rural delivery universal.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman to say there is half a million in the bill for that purpose?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Five hundred and sixty thousand dollars.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CONNOR, until January 5, 1903, on account of important business.

Then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Attorney-General, submitting drafts of amendments to the bill to revise and codify the judicial laws of the United States—to the Committee on Revision of the Laws, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of William S. Wood, administrator of estate of Bazil Grigsby, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relating to the claim of Florencia Victoria Moreno La Calle—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relating to the claims of Harry Devlin, Galveston Gas-Fitting and Plumbing Company, and W. L. Ratisseau—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs inclosing papers relating to agreement of Otoe and Missouria Indians in Oklahoma—to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a report relating to accommodations for post-office business at Albuquerque, N. Mex.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MANN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15711) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Clinch River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Knoxville, Lafollette and Jellico Railroad Company, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2830); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, accompanied by a report (No. 2831); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURTON, from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15605) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion, in the State of Louisiana, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2832); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15606) to authorize and empower the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Mermenteau River, in the State of Louisiana, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2833); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. BALL of Delaware, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 12524) granting an increase of pension to Elvira M. Cooper, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2827); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. WILEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11199) granting a pension to Lewis Walton, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2828); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, from the Committee on Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14897) granting an increase of pension to Phillip Mooney, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2829); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15900) granting a pension to Frank G. Himes, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ADAMS: A bill (H. R. 16023) to provide for the reorganization of the consular service of the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. BURLESON: A bill (H. R. 16024) for the establishment of an agrostological station in Texas, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. FLYNN: A bill (H. R. 16056) to put in force in the Indian Territory certain provisions of the laws of Missouri relating to trust companies, and so forth—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. VAN VOORHIS, from the Committee on Appropriations: A bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903—to the Union Calendar.

By Mr. SCARBOROUGH: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 231) to provide for securing statistics of annual acreage planted in cotton in the several States and Territories, the amount used by textile mills of the United States, and of the cotton-seed oil industry—to the Select Committee on the Census.

By Mr. GRAFF: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 232) providing for change of methods of printing the Report on Field Operations of the Bureau of Soils, Department of Agricultnre—to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. DE ARMOND: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 233) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States respecting the beginning and ending of the Presidential, Vice-Presidential, and Congressional terms—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STEELE: A resolution (H. Res. 356) in relation to the annual report of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers—to the Committee on Printing.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. APLIN: A bill (H. R. 16029) granting an increase of pension to Allen Coons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CORLISS: A bill (H. R. 16030) granting an increase of pension to William J. Hildreth—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16031) granting a pension to Olive Bassett—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. COWHERD: A bill (H. R. 16032) granting an increase of pension to Henry Taylor—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CONNER: A bill (H. R. 16033) granting an increase of pension to John C. Wiley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CANNON: A bill (H. R. 16034) granting a pension to Irwin Fancher—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DALZELL: A bill (H. R. 16035) granting an increase of pension to James Klinesmith—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DEEMER: A bill (H. R. 16036) granting an increase of pension to Edward A. Wilbur—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16037) granting an increase of pension to William C. Best—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HITT: A bill (H. R. 16038) granting a pension to Mary A. Viel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEMENWAY: A bill (H. R. 16039) granting an increase of pension to Vincent M. Cartwright—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LAMB: A bill (H. R. 16040) for the relief of Isidore Cohen—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MERCER: A bill (H. R. 16041) to remove the charge of desertion against Horace Olmstead—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MOODY of Oregon: A bill (H. R. 16042) granting a pension to Andrew J. Swift—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16043) granting a pension to Preston W. Burford—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. POWERS of Massachusetts: A bill (H. R. 16044) granting a pension to Lawrence Mahearn—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16045) granting a pension to Abbie R. Ross—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. RIXEY: A bill (H. R. 16046) for the relief of the legal representatives of Alexander F. Butler—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16047) granting a pension to Eliza J. Wilson—to the Committee on Pensions.

TRUSTS OR COMBINATIONS IN RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I submit a concurrent resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be prepared forthwith, under the direction of the Attorney-General, a compilation of all the laws enacted by the various States of the Union relating to trusts or to combinations in restraint of trade and commerce, of which compilation 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 5,000 shall be for the use of the House of Representatives, and 500 for the use of the Department of Justice.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the resolution is referred, I should like to ask if there was not a similar resolution adopted a week or ten days ago? I think there was.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The resolution to which the Senator from Ohio refers ordered the printing of the compilation recently prepared by direction of the Attorney-General, entitled "Bills and Debates in Congress Relating to Trusts." The resolution which I have submitted applies to legislation in the various States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

THOMAS CORDINGLY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1634) to remove the charge of desertion against Thomas Cordingly; which was, in line 8, after the word "sixty-five," to insert "and the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to issue to him a certificate of honorable discharge from the Navy."

Mr. BERRY. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

INJURIES TO ITALIAN SUBJECTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in regard to the killing, on July 11, 1901, by an armed mob, at Erwin, Miss., of Giovanni and Vincenzo Serio, and the wounding by the same mob of Salvatore Liberto, all subjects of the King of Italy, and recommend that, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, Congress make suitable provision for the heirs of the two Italian subjects killed and for the survivor, Salvatore Liberto, who was injured, the proceeds to be distributed by the Italian Government in such manner as it may deem proper.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 15, 1902.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, I ask leave to present the views of the minority upon House bill 12543, known as the statehood bill. I am directed by the minority of the Committee on Territories to make the report. I ask that it be read and go into the RECORD and be printed as the other reports on this bill have been printed, and I ask that the same number be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee presents the minority views of the Committee on Territories touching the bill known as the omnibus statehood bill and asks that the paper be read.

Mr. BATE. It is not a long report.

There being no objection, the views of the minority were read, as follows:

The minority of your committee, after careful examination of the bill passed at its last session by the House of Representatives for the admission of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico, known as the omnibus statehood bill, approve the same, and therefore recommend its passage without amendment, and present the following additional reasons therefor:

The Constitution provides that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union." Practically this provision presents the question of admission of new States to the discretion and judgment of Congress. But in the light of history as to the meaning and intention of this clause, the question arises, is Congress justified in refusing admission to a Territory which in its population, wealth, and institutions has fully complied with that republican form of government required by the Constitution? Is Congress justified by the Constitution in keeping a Territory without representation and subject to the authority of the United States Government unless upon grounds which the Constitution makes an objection to its admission? A republican form of government is the only requirement which the Constitution makes. And the discretion as to admission which the Constitution reposes in Congress has reference to other matters than the form of government—to population, wealth, and institutions. It never was intended that Congress should bar, by party objection, admission when population, wealth, and institutions were the same as in the case of other States.

The unanimous report of the House committee in favor of the admission of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico recognizes the above reasoning and holds that the probationary period had come to an end, and that in the case of these Territories their demand for admission "was in the nature of a right possessed by the people of the Territories; and, further, that "if lapse of time is essential to qualify a Territory for statehood, those under consideration have more than served out their probation," and that that fact was attested by the action of both the great parties of the country declaring in the platform of the last two conventions in favor of such legislation.

It is not necessary to discuss the question of the right or power of Congress to impose conditions upon admission. Neither the House bill nor the amendment thereto from your Committee on Territories imposes any objectionable conditions. The House, by the act under consideration, recognizes the right of these Territories to admission; that, as to population, each Territory has sufficient numbers by either the United States census or that of the Territorial authorities. And in support of that amendment it is shown that Oklahoma, without the Indian attachment, has a larger population than has heretofore been required of any new State, and that Arizona and New Mexico have each a larger population than many of the new States had when they were admitted to the Union.

It is not clear that Congress has the right to inquire into the character of the population so long as the number of the people is equal to or exceeds that heretofore accepted as sufficient. Nor is it clear that Congress has the means of ascertaining what may be the character of the individuals. It ought to suffice that the 95 per cent of population are white people in Oklahoma and the 90,000 white population in Arizona and the 122,000 white population in New Mexico are quite sufficient to leaven all the foreign-born people in each of those Territories. Whether some of the Northwestern States now swarming with a foreign-born population had as large a leaven of American-born people when admitted need not now be discussed, as their successful example of statehood shows how soon the whole mass becomes Americanized.

The expectation of population, founded on past increase of people in New Mexico, is stated by Governor Otero in his report to be 400,000 in 1910, "composed of intelligent, enterprising, thoroughly American people, second to none in patriotism, culture, and progress."

The investigations made by the Committee on the Territories of the House of Representatives sustain this hope of the governor. That committee reports that—

"In all the Territories the population is distinctly American, and the best type of American, made up of those who seek life's prizes by toil and patience. Of what manner of men this population is made up let their work speak. Cities and towns, with all that modern civilization demands, homes of culture and refinement, schools and higher institutions of learning, public and private charitable institutions, everywhere the free church and free press. These are not the monuments of the Indian nor the Mexican, the idle nor the vicious. The past legislation of the Territories has recorded forever the wisdom, the justice, of the people. It can be safely said that they can not be unfavorably compared with the people of any State of the Union."

The second important subject for consideration is the wealth of the people in those Territories as to bearing the expenses of a State government. Omitting all speculation as to the increased value of land which statehood would assure, the report of Governor Otero on the industrial improvement between June 30, 1901, and June 30, 1902, shows that the incorporated capital for that year was $30,845,130, with fees aggregating $10,706. Of the 204 incorporated companies, 110 was for milling and smelting, with $73,017,630 capital; 63 companies for manufacturing and other industrial pursuits, with $4,796,500 capital; 6 bank, building, and loan associations, with $4,830,000; 5 railway companies, to build 449 miles of road, with $6,200,000 capital; irrigation and improvement companies, with $2,011,000 capital. There are 14 national banks in the Territory, an increase of 4 in the last year, and there are 12 Territorial banks, having resources of nearly $10,000,000 and deposits of over $7,500,000.

The report of Governor Otero on the fiscal interests of the New Mexico Territory removes all doubt as to the ability of the Territory to sustain the expenses of a State government. He reports them to be "in excellent condition," with the accumulation of a surplus in almost every fund of the treasury, enabling all appropriations to be promptly met, and "leaving a handsome sum to be turned toward the reduction of our interest-bearing debt." That "the standing of the Territory in all financial centers of the world is gilt-edged. The bonded debt on June 1, 1901, was $1,180,900; paid during the past year, $57,600; bonded debt outstanding January 1, 1902, $1,123,300; sinking fund on hand at this writing for the redemption of the bonded debt, $89,246.26; net bonded debt, $1,034,053.47. For more than a year past the Territory has been endeavoring to buy in its unmatured bonds, but the holders prefer to retain them. During the past year many orders have been constantly on file in the treasury to take over any bonds the Territory might issue, and there has also been a wide demand for the county and school district bond. The Territorial tax, being for all purposes, is now 13 mills, far below the average in the Western States."

Such is the financial condition of the Territory to which your Committee on Territories denies the boon of statehood.

The third consideration is that of the institutions of the Territory for moral and industrial improvement and progress.

The right, progress, and prosperity of the Indians within the State are protected by a constitutional pledge, disclaiming all right and title to the unappropriated public lands lying within the boundaries of the State and to all lands lying within said limits owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribes, and having the Indians under the protection of the United States.

The State constitution will be framed on the model of the other States, and embody all the features so essential to the liberty, progress, and prosperity of the people. And yet the State ready to adopt such a constitution is to be shut out of the Union by the amendment submitted by the majority of the Senate Committee on Territories.

It is not only the exclusion of New Mexico and Arizona by the amendment that is objected to by the minority of the Senate committee, but we protest against that amendment as much for what it provides as for what it omits.

All precedents for the admission of new States have been preceded by expression of a desire on the part of the people to become a State in the Union. But the amendment submitted by the Senate Committee on Territories incorporates the Indian Territory with the State of Oklahoma without an organized expression of the people of the Indian Territory of any desire to be either a State or a part of Oklahoma. So far as your committee has information, this alliance may be the union of an unwilling people in an undesirable connection. The enabling acts of Congress for the admission of new States have heretofore been preceded by some expression of a desire for statehood on the part of the people affected by such legislation, and in no case have the people of any Territory been compelled by the enabling act to form a State constitution against their expressed will as to statehood.

However much the people of Oklahoma may desire statehood, the Indians have made no expression of any such desire. They are compelled by this amendment to come into the Union as an attachment to Oklahoma. Whether or not qualified for citizenship of a State, with all its responsibilities, these Indians are to be made citizens of the new State, but with the guardianship of the United States still over them for their protection, different from that given to the rest of the people of the proposed State.

The amendment provides that the new constitution shall not "limit or affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any laws or regulations respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, which it would have been competent to make if this act had never passed."

In no other State of the Union does any such dual condition exist; and the fact of its incorporation in this act is a confession that the Indians, their lands, property, and other rights can not be safely intrusted to the government of the new State. And in the light of the history of the Indian tribes in their relation to the white man the restriction is well taken, but it is nevertheless a curb upon a State heretofore unknown in our history.

It may be old-fashioned and out of date to plead for State rights, local self-government, and to contend for the same equality of conditions for a new State that exists in all other States. But this guardianship by the United Stases of the Indians, their property, their lands, and their rights, makes a condition precedent to the Constitution of the new State, and is an anomaly in our history which shows a want of confidence in the treatment of the Indians by the new State.

This merger of different races, this mixture of citizenship—half Indian, half white men—compelled by this amendment, has no precedent in our history. Nor are there any past facts that offer inducement for the attempt to disregard the prejudices and passions of two races of people and to yoke them together in the indissoluble bond of statehood.

As there has been no expression of any desire of statehood on the part of the Indians, so there exists no public necessity for this anomalous mixture of races in statehood.

The amendment of the committee to the House bill strikes out the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and leaves the people of those Territories still out of the Union, notwithstanding New Mexico has prayed for statehood twenty-odd times and has for a half century been denied that boon. It was well said in the House that "the bill now before the House is the forty-sixth bill that appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in which New Mexico has made an effort to enter the Union. A similar case does not exist with reference to any Territory of this country. A similar example of national neglect has not occurred in all the history of this nation."

At page 41 of the report of the governor of New Mexico to the Secretary of the Interior will be found the last memorial of the legislative assembly of the Territory to the Congress praying admission to the Union. The memorial claims admission to the Union as a right, because the heretofore regarded privilege has been pledged by the provisions of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo—the solemn promise of the United States to the Republic of Mexico—more than half a century ago. The lapse of time has converted the "proper time" (to be judged by the Congress of the United States) into the present if the provision of the treaty is ever to have significance. And that view has been taken by both political parties in their last platforms of principles, and ratified by the unanimous report of the House Committee on Territories, which, without division on party lines, recommended the passage of the bill which this committee has emasculated by its amendment.

It was the voice of the whole country, as spoken by both political parties, which pledged their good faith to remove an "intolerable" condition of Territorial government and replace it with statehood, which the increased population, wealth, and national advancement renders proper at this time.

The House of Representatives has acceded to this view and recognized the right of the Territory to admission by the passage of the bill which this committee has amended by a most remarkable and novel substitute, which defeats the prayer of the people of this Territory and Arizona and overrides the treaty pledge of the Government of the United States and the voice of both political parties as uttered in their last platforms. Arizona, also excluded from statehood by this amendment of the Senate Committee on Territories, stands on exactly the same moral, legal, and constitutional grounds with Oklahoma and New Mexico.

The population of the Territory is sufficient in numbers, her wealth is abundant to bear the expenses of a State government, and her institutions are in harmony with those of all the other States. Yet this amendment remits her to a Territorial condition after more than fifty years of probation.

Each of these Territories has complied with every requirement heretofore made by the Congress for admission into the Union.

Each of these Territories has population sufficient for representation in Congress. Each of these Territories has wealth abundant to support all the expenses of statehood. Each of these Territories has institutions in harmony with republican government as understood in the Union.

The reasons and arguments against the amendment of the Senate Committee on Territories to H. R. No. 12543, for the admission into the Union of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma, are most forcibly presented in the views of Senator QUAY, of Pennsylvania, as they appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. There is, it would seem, but little remaining to be said, outside of his report, against the amendment proposed by the Senate committee, or for the passage by the Senate of the act passed by the House of Representatives. Senator QUAY has embodied in his views the entire report of the Committee on Territories of the House of Representatives, a strong and exhaustive paper, covering the whole subject. He has further shown the unqualified committal of the Republican party in the national convention in favor of home rule and the early admission to statehood of the Territories of New Mexico, Arizona, and Oklahoma, and emphasized that recommendation by enumerating the leading members of his party who are now to pass upon the proposed legislation by repeating the names of those who led the last national Republican convention. He has further shown the political inconsistency and "direct violation of the pledge made by the Republican platform" that would follow the passage of the amendment of the Senate Committee on Territories, and emphasized his views by naming the Republican Senators and the President, Mr. Roosevelt, who, as members of that convention, stand publicly pledged to the passage of the act of the House of Representatives unamended in any way which would emasculate the public pledge of the Republican party.

He has also shown that the "inclusion of the Indian Territory with the State of Oklahoma" would be a practical violation of treaties and agreements made by the United States with the various tribes of Indians that make up the Indian Territory, and that Congress stands pledged by recent legislation not to disturb the tribal relations of those Indians prior to "the period of eight years from the 4th of March, 1898," which will not expire until the 4th of March, 1906.

With each and all of these cogent reasons and unanswerable arguments the views of the minority fully concur, because the Constitution of the United States, in providing that "new States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union," remits the admission of these Territories to the discretion and judgment of Congress, not indefinitely as to time, but only for that period of time necessary for the acquisition of the population, wealth, and institutions which is required by a republican form of government as understood in the Union.

We hold that under the theory of our Government communities, which is the foundation stone of the American system of republican government, Congress is not justified by the Constitution in keeping a Territory without representation and subject to the authority of the United States upon any other grounds than the want of a republican form of government or that the population, wealth, and institutions of the Territory are not suited to statehood. It never was contemplated that Congress could exclude from the Union, for party reasons, a Territory whose constitution was republican in form and whose population was sufficient in numbers, whose public wealth was able to stand the taxation necessary to maintain the expenses of statehood, and whose institutions, of the same character with those of the other States in the Union, would promote and advance the moral and physical welfare of the people.

The views of the minority are in strict conformity with the pledge given by the Democratic party in its last and other platforms of principles. And their indorsement of the report and their recommendation for passage of the House bill attest the nonpartisan position of the minority of the committee. The interest, so vast and vital, of the people in each of these Territories rises above party divisions. And it is to be regretted that the concurrence of both parties in their platform pledges of statehood to these Territories should have been disregarded in the report and recommendation for passage of this amendment, so contradictory to the pledge of each of the great political parties.

The printing of the report of the committee in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday last enables the minority to review briefly the remarkable statements that fill its columns.

The printed report of the Committee on Territories has disclosed some rather fanciful qualifications for statehood as well as "rules" for admission. The latter, it is true, recognizes the "sliding scale," which may run from 60,000 up or down, as the interests of party may suggest. The rule of 60,000 is held in the report to be neither "scientific nor based upon the principle of popular government for the nation." Therefore, abandoning the 60,000 rule, the report relies on a "rule of unit of representation," according to which New Mexico exceeds the rule by the difference between 194.182, the unit of Congressional representation in 1900, and 195,310, the amount of population given New Mexico by the census of 1900; while Arizona falls below the rule by the difference between 122,931 and 194,182

The census of 1900, if correctly taken, no longer truthfully represents the present population of Territories so attractive to immigration as those of New Mexico and Arizona. The report then turns its back on the rule of units of population with a suggestion of a new rule, which is that a new State "should be large enough to bear some fair proportion to the population of the Republic," and then the report, which suggests that the population of new States should be at least 1,650,000, provides for the admission of Oklahoma with a population of less than one-half of the suggested number. It is said to be a "bad rule that won't work both ways," and if the proposed rule is to be called into existence let it come after the present Territories are admitted, for no sensible man apprehends that Senators from Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma would so dilute the Senate that it would no longer be able to consider those "matters of vital national concern" which are now "determined by the Senate or in conjunction with the executive department."

The "other qualifications" are spread out in all the amplitude of verbiage to be as follows:

"But not only are numbers of people requisite. The advancement of that people, their state of life, their familiarity and sympathy with our institutions, their educational condition, and all of the elements that go to make up good citizenship are to be equally considered."

For practical use in this discussion we shall condense the other qualification to wealth and institutions which harmonize with a republican form of government.

If illiteracy is to be a bar against the admission of New Mexico, who can tell how long the Territorial condition will have to continue before illiteracy will disappear? And as it is desirable that illiteracy should disappear at the earliest possible moment, the American school system, possible only in its perfection in a State, should be immediately set at work upon the subject by the admission of the Territory into the Union. The report admits that the Territory has "a fair start educationally," as the following extract evidences:

"As to educational progress, and especially advance in the speaking of English, the committee, after having made every possible allowance, are of the opinion that the very most that can be said is that New Mexico is beginning to get a fair start and no more. In saying this the committee have in mind the excellent schools, and particularly the high schools, of East Lasvegas and Albuquerque, for which too much can not be said, and also the divided work of Superintendent Wood, of Santa Fe, and the corps of teachers under him.

UNIVERSITY OF NEW MEXICO.

"The Territory has at Albuquerque university buildings worthy of high praise. The university is presided over by a competent president, under whom is a corps of efficient instructors. The university is attended by 110 students, of whom a large percentage are from the town of Albuquerque itself. This institution is, of course, growing in power and influence, and in time will make itself felt for the good of the Southwest."

"The future of the Mexican element" may be safely left to the spirit of Americanism, which has assimilated Swedes, Poles, Germans, and Scandinavians and made the Irishman far more of an American than an English subject. But one can not agree with the report that—

"As to the remaining, or 'Americans,' some of them are not as good citizens as the Mexican element. (Testimony of Judge Mills.) Such are the 'riffraff,' to use the expression of United States Judge Mills (testimony, p. 1), who first follow the introduction of railroads, and certain other elements always seen on any country's extending frontier, but these are, of course, disappearing. The majority of 'Americans,' however, are good material for citizenship, and of a large number of them absolutely too much can not be said.

"In the 'American' town of East Lasvegas and in the 'American' town of Albuquerque there are men and women of culture, refinement, ability, energy, and all the best qualities of human character unexcelled by the most favored section, either in country or city, of this or any other land. This is true of the 'American' element of Santa Fe, of the little town of Carlsbad (population, from 800 to 1,000), of the flourishing town of Boswell (population, 2,000), both on the Pecos River, and, as the committee are informed, of Alamogordo and Deming, and perhaps one or two other points."

The "riffraff" who "first follow the railroads" have been the sturdy Irishmen whose pick and spade and labor have built the hundred thousand miles of American railroads. Why that "riffraff" should not be as good citizens in New Mexico as they are in every other State and Territory the report does not advise the Senate. Protesting that the witness upon whose testimony this slur as to "riffraff" has been made was greatly misinformed, we are forced to conclude that there has been a mistake made somewhere between the witness and the committee, since the testimony has all the earmarks of a purpose "to convict" of "unpreparedness of Arizona and New Mexico" rather than to enlighten the Senate as to their republican form of government.

The comparisons of these Territories with towns and cities in the States establishes no more than would the same kind of comparison between the area of these Territories and that of Delaware and Rhode Island, or of population with that of Nebraska. Such comparisons are simply ridiculous, without showing the reasons of inequality.

After so much evidence of "unpreparedness," it is pleasant to know that there is one Territory which is fully prepared for admission. But Oklahoma, notwithstanding its high development, this report says, ought not to be admitted without its Indian complement, because "its size is much below that of any Western State," but that Oklahoma and Indian Territory will be "a natural unit." What a natural unit is has not been established by law or precedent, but this report abundantly shows that the alliance of Indian and white man in statehood is more likely to make an unnatural unit. And this appears from the telegrams submitted by Senator QUAY, some of which are here given: "Oklahoma wants statehood bad, but never with the Indian Territory." "Loyal Oklahomans want immediate statehood by omnibus bill and oppose substitute." "Condition of Indian Territory not ripe for statehood." "Recommend that the Indian Territory be not now attached."

But, in addition to being "a natural unit," the report affirms that the "people of Oklahoma and Indian Territory" are "united" because the "wholesalers' association of Oklahoma and Indian Territory are the same." That may be in all respects a veritable fact, but it only proves that "wholesalers" want to sell to the whole of the buyers. It has no political, financial, or Territorial significance. It says that the Catholic Church has one bishop and the Episcopal Church only one for both Territories; and the Epworth League is common to the two Territories. However true in letter and spirit this may be, it has little bearing on the weightier matters of the law, the Constitution, and the fitness of the Territories for statehood.

It by no means follows that "what nature, commerce, and all human conditions have decreed the Congress of the United States should confirm." Such a platform is too broad without several amendments to the Constitution.

The report continues:

"The two Territories should be made one State and immediately admitted to the Union. Together they make a State about the size of Kansas or Nebraska and much smaller than the average State west of the Missouri River. As a single State they would make a noble addition to the nation, of which their people and the citizens of the whole Republic would be justly proud."

The composite character—Indians and white people—the report regards as a recommendation to be "proud of" for Oklahoma, but treats as a disqualification the fellow-citizenship of Mexicans and Americans in New Mexico for a new State.

Such inconsistencies and contradictions impeach the report in its recommendations as well as in its objections to statehood for the three Territories. But nothing in the report will excite the smile of incredulity more than the objection to New Mexico that—

"With the docile and easily persuaded character of the native population of the latter Territory, it is as certain as the future that they will be induced—and that with great ease—to vote enormous subsidies to proposed railroads, sadly impoverishing themselves while enriching the enterprising promoters. This is not an imaginary forecast, but a future certainty, and it is certainty from which the innocent people of New Mexico should be protected. As they are, the shield of the national limitation of 4 per cent upon their indebtedness stands between them and exploiters. Remove it and they are defenseless in their ignorance and confiding simplicity against that masterful vigor and artful craft which the exploiter always brings to his aid."

The "native population" of New Mexico—however "docile and easily persuaded," according to the report of the committee, are regarded by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] in quite a different light, for he reports that New Mexico—

"Has a solid, stable, responsible, and conservative element in her native population which counteracts the danger. They are attached to the soil and have no thought of leaving. They are identified with the country and naturally opposed to rash schemes which involve extravagant expense and debt. Mixed with the overzealous American, they form an admirable combination."

As these contradictory reports as to New Mexico come each from a Republican source and authority, the minority of the committee has deemed it well to put the two opinions in close proximity for the judgment of the Senate. It was the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] who says for the reasons "that the Republican party in 1900 promised statehood to the Territories of Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma, while no such pledge was made or promised in the national convention for the Indian Territory, which is not now fit for statehood, and that these Territories compare favorably in number and character of population as well as in resources and territorial extent with nearly all of the States admitted to the Union for many years past, and in accordance with the precedence of our history, I recommend that House bill No. 12543 be passed without amendment."

The majority denying New Mexico and Arizona the benefit of these reasons nevertheless recommend statehood for the Indian Territory for somewhat similar reasons.

Believing that Congress stands pledged by its legislation of 1898 not to disturb the tribal relations of the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians which comprise the organization known as the Indian Territory, certainly not before 1906, and that to pass this substitute or amendment to H. R. bill 12543, as is contemplated by the majority of the Committee on Territories, would be a flagrant violation of the spirit and letter of that act of 1898, we, as the minority of your said committee, can but condemn any step in that direction as unwarranted, unjust, and even cruel on the part of our Government.

Again, the minority of your committee believe that Congress is not justified by the Constitution in withholding statehood and representation from an organized Territory of sufficient area and population, and that is contiguous to our States, when they ask for statehood with a republican form of government, and that have taxable property to sustain necessary expenses; with institutions for educational attainments, for moral and religious observance, for meting out justice to citizens and punishing crime, and with extended and valuable commercial relations.

The Constitution in such case contemplates an admission to statehood. We, as the minority of your Committee on Territories, submit to the Senate whether such is not the condition as relates to the Territories of Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona. If so, can we in justice deny this right to them by obstructive or other legislation? Is it good faith to our fellow-citizens and friends who are knocking at our door for admission?

Furthermore, we, the minority of your committee, wish to emphasize the fact that both of the great national parties in their last national conventions called these three Territories—Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona—by name and recommended their admission into statehood, while in no instance in a national convention, or even a State convention, has it been suggested that the Indian Territory be admitted as a State, or that Oklahoma and the Indian Territory be united and admitted as such.

The minority of the committee, swayed by nonpartisan purposes, regard the pledge of the parties to statehood for the three Territories as obligatory upon Congress, and recommend the passage of the act adopted by the House of Representatives without amendment of any kind.

WM. B. BATE.
HENRY HEITFELD.
JOSEPH W. BAILEY.
T. M. PATTERSON.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The views of the minority will be printed.

Mr. BATE. I also ask that the same number of copies of the views of the minority be printed as have been ordered printed of the report of the majority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has been consented to heretofore.

HENRY E. BURTON.

Mr. PROCTOR obtained the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is unavoidably absent from the Chamber, has expressed a very great desire to have a private pension bill, being Senate bill 6151, considered this morning. I will ask the Senator from Vermont if he will yield for that purpose?

Mr. PROCTOR. With great pleasure

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6151) granting an increase of pension to Henry E. Burton.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with an amendment, in line 9, before the word "dollars," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Henry E. Burton, late second lieutenant Company I, Thirty-fifth Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further amendment as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I addressed the Chair before the bill was reported to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair recognizes the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill, to strike out section 24.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator allow the amendment already made as in Committee of the Whole to be concurred in in the Senate before he offers his amendment?

Mr. BATE. That will not affect the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. If it does not affect the amendment I desire to offer, I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No matter. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 15 it is proposed to strike out section 24.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, in the preceding part of the bill the National Guard has been provided for. Section 24 provides for what is called a reserve force of trained men as a part of the militia. It provides that these men, to the number of a hundred thousand, apportioned among the States, shall be officered and drilled and called into service by the United States.

Mr. President, I believe that this section is a direct infringement of the constitutional authority given to the States; and in order to call the attention of Senators to the point I will read one provision from the Constitution.

The Congress shall have power to * * * provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Now, here is a part of the militia, organized to the number of a hundred thousand men, and this reserve force is not in any way subject to the authority of the State. It is to be officered by the President. It is to be controlled and drilled by the authority of the United States. The State has no authority, so far as I have been able to see, to interfere in any way with this force, called the reserve force of trained men, but the entire power is given to the President of the United States. Of course the Congress in case of war would have to declare the war. But this force is to be officered, drilled, controlled, and called into service without any sort of authority whatever on the part of the States.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. HALE. I am very much interested in what the Senator from Alabama is saying, because my mind has been running in the same direction. What I fear is that without our knowing it we may pass something that will take the control of the militia—the formation of militia companies and the extent of the participation of citizens in the militia—away from the States and commit it to the General Government. Of that the Senator is not in favor, and I am not. Now, before he gets through I wish he would tell the Senate what part of the bill it is that gives rise in his mind to his apprehension.

Mr. SPOONER. Section 24.

Mr. PETTUS. Section 24.

Mr. HALE. I have just come into the Chamber. Perhaps the Senator from Alabama has already referred to that. It is section 24.

Mr. PETTUS. Section 24.

Mr. HALE. I did not know. The Senator has moved to strike out section 24, I am told.

Mr. PETTUS. I call the Senator's attention to the particular words:

Such reserve force shall be designated as the national volunteer reserve, and when called forth by the President shall serve wherever ordered, within or without the territory of the United States.

Now, that also is in direct violation of the Constitution. The militia can not be sent out of the United States at all according to the Constitution.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will the Senator from Alabama allow me?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The troops provided for in section 24 are not militia. They are volunteers. They are called the national volunteer reserve, the Senator will see. They are not called militia. If the Senator will read carefully, he will see that this force is to be ready for service "whenever called for and organized under authority of Congress." Their organization is precisely the same as that of the volunteers sent to the Philippines, the best organized and officered corps of volunteers, I believe, that we have ever sent into the service. They are volunteers. They are not militia.

Mr. PETTUS. Will the Senator read that part of the bill which shows where they are to volunteer? You call them "volunteers," but will you show where you make them volunteers in substance?

Mr. HALE. Right here, what is the force of this provision:

The Secretary of War is authorized to apportion among the several States and Territories—

That is, to decide how many men each State shall furnish—and to enroll—

not exceeding 100,000 men.

Who is to decide how that enrollment shall be done, how far it shall apply, and what duties are incumbent upon the soldier under that? I should like to be enlightened on that point.

Mr. PETTUS. I have examined it with some care. I do not find any provision at all for the volunteering of this force. It is an organized force. The United States is to organize it. It is to be organized of men who have served in the National Guard or as volunteers in the Army.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I interrupt the Senator with some reluctance, and only because he has apparently invited some one to do so. I interrupt him to call his attention to the provision found in section 24, on page 16, where it is provided how the national volunteer reserve force shall be called out.

The first provision on page 16 with respect to calling out the militia is that commencing in line 14, which provides for the calling out of the organized militia. The organized militia is that militia which is organized and officered by the States and in the armanent, drilling, and maintenance of which generally the National Government is to assist; and the provision is:

Whenever a volunteer force shall be called for by authority of Congress, and the members of any companies, troops, batteries, battalions, or regiments of the organized militia shall enlist in the Volunteer Army in bodies, such companies, troops, batteries, battalions, or regiments shall be received as the first organizations of such volunteer force.

Then follows the provision as to the national volunteer reserve, which is in no case whatever a part of the militia. It is not made so by the proposed act, except only in the sense that all persons between the ages of 18 and 45 are part of the militia of the United States. The provision is that when a greater force is needed than the organized militia of the several States amounts to——

Mr. PETTUS. I will ask the Senator from what line he reads?

Mr. FORAKER. I am about to read now from line 20. When the organized militia are insufficient, then the national volunteer reserve force is to be called forth; and here is the provision with respect to it. The Senator will see, as I read it, that it is entirely under the authority of Congress. The President and the War Department are both alike helpless under this provision to call out anybody except by authority of Congress:

Whenever a volunteer force—

Not the organized militia, but when we are threatened with invasion, when we need an additional force beyond that which the organized militia will supply, then this national volunteer reserve force can be called on, and it is denominated here a volunteer force—

Whenever a volunter force shall be called for by authority of Congress, exceeding in number the * * * organized militia—

Without stopping to read all of it, then this force may be called out, and in that contingency, when the national volunteer reserve force is needed and is called out, the National Government shall take charge of the force and shall organize it, drill it, officer it, just as we did the volunteer force which we sent to the Philippines. I would say more but I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. Before the Senator from Alabama resumes his remarks, I beg leave to make an inquiry of him somewhat in line with the suggestions of the Senator from Ohio.

I call his attention to the fact that there seem to be three distinct provisions in section 24. From line 12, on page 15, to line 14, on page 16, it seems to relate to the national volunteer reserve force, so distinctly called. From line 14 to line 20 it seems to relate to any volunteer force which may be called. From line 20, page 16, down to line 15, on page 17, the proposed statute seems to relate to a volunteer force which shall be called for by authority of Congress, "exceeding in number the companies, troops, batteries, battalions, and regiments of the organized militia," which words "organized militia," as I understand, will not include the national volunteer reserve, and that organized militia "shall enlist in bodies pursuant to section 6 of the act entitled 'An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes,' approved April 22, 1898."

Now, it is my apprehension from the reading of this section that all of the organized militia are to have their officers appointed in the same manner as under the act of April 22, 1898. By that act it is provided that each regiment of the Volunteer Army shall have one surgeon, two assistant surgeons, one captain, and that all the regimental and company officers shall be appointed by the governors of the States in which their respective organizations are raised. So it is clear that the organized militia will have their officers appointed by the governors of the States, by the reference of the pending bill to the act of April 22, 1898, which so provides.

I ask the Senator if it is not clear, from the further provision of section 24 in reference to the national volunteer reserve, which is mentioned in the forepart of section 24, and in reference to any volunteer force which may be "called for by authority of Congress, exceeding in number the companies, troops, batteries, battalions, and regiments of the organized militia which shall enlist in bodies," etc., that they shall have their officers appointed under the provisions of "section 12 of the act entitled 'An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes,' approved March 2, 1899?" By the latter act the officers of such forces are appointed by the President; and is it not clear, therefore, that both the national volunteer reserve, to be trained under the Secretary of War, and any other volunteer force which may be created, will have their officers appointed by Federal authority?

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, as I understand the act, what we call the National Guard is to be officered by the State under this bill; but whenever you get outside of that, both the reserve force and the general militia when called out are to be officered entirely by the Government of the United States, and not only officered by it, but called out by it.

Mr. President, if the distinguished Senator in charge of this bill is correct in his interpretation of it, then this is nothing more or less than a hundred thousand men added to the Regular Army of the United States, in reserve, it is true, for the time being, but who may be called out at any moment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator will see, I think, that it is only when authorized by Congress. It gives the Administration no power to call them out. It is only when authorized by Congress.

Whenever called for and organized under authority of Congress.

It is found in the third line of section 24.

Mr. HALE. That says:

For the purpose of providing a reserve force of trained men, which shall be ready for immediate service whenever called—

But it does not say——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

Mr. COCKRELL. "Whenever called for and organized under authority of Congress."

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. COCKRELL. They can not be called except by authority of Congress.

Mr. HALE. But they are to be enrolled and apportioned before that, and are to be a reserve force all ready for service when Congress acts. But Congress has not to act before the Secretary of War apportions so many to a State and enrolls so many. It makes it therefore an additional force of a hundred thousand men.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. PETTUS. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I can understand why the Senator from Maine should have some doubt in his mind as to the propriety of this provision, unless he has carefully examined it. At one time I had in my mind some doubt of its propriety. When this bill was under consideration in the committee I did not, upon the first reading, understand what this provision was, but when I looked into it more carefully I became satisfied with it, and in that view which I reached I was confirmed by the Secretary of War in the testimony he gave before the committee when he came there to explain this measure.

The character of this provision is simply this: The militia, according to the provisions of this bill, is divided into three classes—first, the organized militia; second, the national volunteer reserve, and third, the remainder of the militia, called the reserve militia, I believe, in the language of the bill. As to the organized militia, nobody had any doubt as to the propriety of the provisions of this bill. There was no discussion upon any of those provisions. When it came to the second class, the national volunteer reserve, we all wanted a little more information than the bill on its face imparted. We examined it therefore with a good deal of care, and the Secretary of War came, as I have said, and explained that the effect of that provision, not only as we interpreted it, but as the Secretary interpreted it, is that we are simply to provide for the enrollment of a hundred thousand men who have seen service, and who, if called upon to come into the service, will be already drilled and who will know what military discipline is.

Mr. COCKRELL. Enrolling simply means taking down their names on a book in the War Department.

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly. That is just what I wanted to say. It involves no expense to the Government. It is proposed by the Secretary of War to carry out the provision in this way: Hereafter as men are enlisted in the Regular Army he will require them not only to consent to the usual term of enlistment, which I believe is three years, but also to have their names go upon the volunteer reserve roll.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. In just a moment. So, when they are mustered out at the end of their term of three years, they will be free from service and the Government will be free from obligation to them, except only in the contingency of war, in which event the Secretary of War would have in the War Department in the course of time—he could not have them at once—the names and the addresses of a hundred thousand men who had seen service, and whom, if there was an emergency justifying it, he could call upon to come at once into the service of the United States.

Mr. HALE. I for one am very glad to hear the Senator from Ohio, because he is always lucid in his explanations. I see how his mind runs upon this subject. Has he any doubt that these hundred thousand men, whenever the time is reached that they are wanted, whenever they organize, shall be volunteers?

Mr. FORAKER. None whatever. They are to be volunteers.

Mr. HALE. Has the Secretary, under the power of apportionment and enrolling, any authority to say to a State "Your proportion of this hundred thousand men is 1,500, and you must furnish them?" Is there any such power?

Mr. FORAKER. There is no requirement at all upon the State. There is a limitation placed by this bill upon the number that may be so enrolled. In order that there may be some equality, ratably according to population, in the enrollment, it is provided that they shall be apportioned among the States. No State is required to furnish any number, but if the proportion of the Senator's State, Maine, should be 1,500, using the figures he has just quoted, when 1,500 men had been thus enrolled from the State of Maine, no additional men could be enrolled and credited to that State until other States had their proper proportion.

Mr. HALE. If I may put in another word there, that is, whenever 1,500 men, such as are described here, shall have volunteered and are enrolled, then they make up the number which the State may—not must—furnish. The phrase the Senator used is very important—that the State is not required to furnish any.

Mr. FORAKER. The State is not required to furnish any under the provisions of this bill. This whole force will remain inactive, except only in the contingency of Congress authorizing the President to call it into service. We merely have in the War Department a list of names amounting in the aggregate when the whole force has been enrolled to a hundred thousand.

Mr. HALE. Then it is nothing but a silent, or perhaps it would be better to say, a dormant force.

Mr. FORAKER. That is all; and the purpose of it is to enable the War Department to know where, in an hour of emergency, they can lay their hands on trained and skilled men who have seen service.

Mr. HALE. But until such time is reached it is a dormant force?

Mr. FORAKER. Absolutely so, and is no expense to anybody.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Is the Senator from Ohio certain that he is correct in that statement?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir; I am. I know what is in the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin, I think, because I had the same query.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. PETTUS. If gentlemen will allow me——

Mr. FORAKER. Excuse me.

Mr. PETTUS. I will beg them all to excuse me until I have made the remarks I rose to make.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PETTUS. I really think gentlemen ought not to take the floor in this manner and make the speech for the man who is entitled to the floor. I do not want to be discourteous and will yield for any question that Senators may desire to ask me, but I will not yield to have my speech made for me by somebody else.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is right, and I beg his pardon for coming in in this way; but I merely wanted to ask a question.

Mr. PETTUS. I so understood the Senator from Maine, but the Senator from Ohio undertook to explain the whole subject.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I think in justice to myself I ought to be allowed to state to the Senate that I asked the permission of the Senator from Alabama before interrupting him; and I said to him, when I interrupted him, that I would not do so unless it was entirely agreeable to him, and I understood it was. I am hardly responsible for the fact that my remarks were somewhat protracted. It was due to the fact that others plied me with inquiries, which, being on my feet, I thought it was all right for me to answer. I beg the Senator's pardon. I shall not interrupt him again.

Mr. PETTUS. I make no censure of the Senator from Ohio. He had my express permission. The Presiding Officer asked me, and I gave it. But I had no idea he intended to debate the whole subject.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not so intend, either.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, taking one man off the floor for another man to make a speech for him is a bad habit.

Now, to get back to the subject, it is said this is not the militia. Well, if it is not the militia, what is it? It is to be organized within the States in proportion to their population. It is to be distributed as nearly as may be over the States. What is it if it is not militia? If it is not militia, then I do not see where the authority of Congress comes in to organize it, unless it is an army. I do not find in the Constitution any authority for the Congress to organize in the States anything but the militia. I find plenty of authority in the Constitution for the Government of the United States to organize any army it chooses, but it must be an army, and that is what this thing is.

What do you mean, if this is a mere thing that you are going to record? You enroll the men, and for what length of time do you enroll them? You enroll them as volunteers. That is the name you give them when you enroll them. And you enroll them for five years. To be sure, it may be that on a proper construction the Congress would have to call them out, though even that is extremely doubtful, because here the language is:

> Such reserve force shall be designated as the National Volunteer Reserve, and when called forth by the President shall serve wherever ordered, within or without the territory of the United States.

When called out by the President! Mr. President, if this proposed act means to organize the militia it does not do it. If it means to merely have men enrolled so that the President or Secretary of War may know where to find them, it does not stop at that. It enrolls them for five years, and when so enrolled they must obey the order of the President and serve wherever the President orders them to go. Of course the President could not order them to go out of the United States unless the Congress had first declared war.

But, Mr. President, this bill is misleading, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], with his adroit interpretation, would make some people believe that this is not an army. But he can not make any man believe it who reads it for himself. He will know that there are a hundred thousand men already volunteered to serve whenever called on, and this service is to last for five years. They have already volunteered, and you call them the National Volunteer Reserve. That is what you call them. You enlist them for five years. You enroll them for five years.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States evidently contemplated that the United States should have an army of its own, and that the States should have an army of their own which should be called the militia; that is all, and it is of very vast importance to the State that it should have this organized militia. I have had no word to say about the National Guard. As the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] has clearly explained, that is militia—organized militia—organized in the States and by the States and officered by the States, for the governor is to appoint all its officers.

But, Mr. President, when you come down to the National Volunteer Reserve you strike a solid army of 100,000 men already volunteered and ready to be called out, thus prostituting a good thing into a regular army.

The organized militia in the States is of vast importance to the States. The Constitution itself says:

> A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

In addition the State has a right to officer this militia when it is organized. This army of the States, called militia, is as essential as any other power that a State has, and this bill takes away from the States that power which they ought of right to have.

Moreover, Mr. President, there is another thing about this bill. I do not mention it now in connection with foreign countries, but in connection with our own country here, and without going outside of it. It enables the President to take the volunteer force of New York and send it over to Chicago; for any purposes that the law authorizes him to send any troops there he can use this volunteer reserve militia. He can use it whenever he chooses, and send them from New York to California, or from Chicago to New Orleans. He can send them wherever he pleases under this bill; and unless we intend to abandon entirely the rights of the States in the control of its own militia, the bill ought not to pass in its present shape.

I favor in every way possible what we call the organized militia. It has got to be called lately the National Guard. In my State it is a small force, but it is of incalculable value to the order of the State. It is a force that can be concentrated by the governor at any point in the State in a short time, and thus we have absolute security for order and peace at home; and so have all the other States. The authority ought to be in the State to preserve its order at home, and it can only be there.

What authority now has the governor over all this reserve volunteer force? None in the world. There is not one single particle of authority given here. It would be absolutely contrary to the whole spirit of this bill for the governor to have anything to do with them, either to officer them or to call them out in case of need. He could call out all the militia except this army of the United States.

Mr. President, we have got standing army enough, and whenever the United States wants an army to do its fighting they can very easily get it. They can have as many men as they choose by calling on the citizens of the United States to volunteer. Where is the use of having their names down unless you have got them already enrolled? You call them enrolled, but this is an adroit mode of adding to the Regular Army 100,000 men in reserve, taken out of the militia, as it is called, and already volunteered for the service of the United States, and thus the State is deprived by this bill of the best material in it for its own defense.

If gentlemen want the United States to control the militia entirely, this is a very good bill to do it, but unless you want to abandon State rights in all its forms, this reserve force ought not to be provided for.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the President can not move this volunteer force one foot until they are called for and organized under authority of Congress. When they are, he can move them anywhere in this country or any other, the same as any volunteer force.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to interrupt him at that point?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator says the President can move this as a volunteer force. Are these 100,000 men in any sense in the Army until a war occurs, or has he any authority respecting them until after they have volunteered? They are not drafted into this service at all, as I understand it, by section 24.

Mr. COCKRELL. We can not hear the Senator from Iowa on this side.

Mr. ALLISON. They are not drafted into the military service under section 24. They are simply registered there because they have served in armies in the past.

Mr. BACON. They can be organized and officered, though.

Mr. ALLISON. They are organized and officered.

Mr. PROCTOR. They are not officered, unless that is authorized by Congress.

Mr. FORAKER. Nor organized, either.

Mr. ALLISON. They are organized by the State.

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg pardon; they are organized the same as the volunteers who went to the Philippines. They are, like the last volunteers who went to the Philippines, officered by the governors.

Mr. ALLISON. If they are organized in the State and volunteer as a military organization under the law of 1898, then they are officered by the governor of the State.

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. But if they are organized under the law of 1899, as volunteers, then of course they are officered by the President.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Ohio answers all that by saying that they are simply a dormant force. They are on the rolls. They belong to a class of men who have been in the regular or volunteer service, but they have no coherence—no organization; they are silent and dormant.

Mr. ALLISON. That I understand. But they are revivified when war begins; and when they are, if they are organized in the State as a part of the National Guard, they are officered by the governor. If they are organized by a volunteer method such as was provided in the act of 1899 they are officered by the President. That is the way I understand it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I should like to read a few lines from a letter from the Secretary of War, read in the House last June in regard to this bill; and before I do that I should like to say a word about the apportionment which has been referred to. Whenever a volunteer force is called for it is apportioned among the States. The War Department would have the rolls of the men who have had service and experience and would send to any State a list of the men in each State who have seen service and are ready to serve again. The Secretary of War says in regard to this matter:

> As we have a three years' term of enlistment in the Regular Army, approximately one-third of the 66,000 go out each year on the expiration of their enrollment. After making allowance for reenlistment, nearly 20,000 a year will be regularly going back into civil life. We want to keep track of those young men and be able to call them out instantly whenever war comes and have the first volunteer regiments composed of them and of the young men who have seen service and graduated from the volunteer regiments of the war with Spain, and who have seen service in the National Guard and have graduated from that.
> Until war comes we will simply keep track of these men by enrollment. When the war comes they will be organized and put into the field ready for immediate service while the other volunteer regiments are being trained.

Mr. ALLISON. That is clear.

Mr. HALE. And that is all that will be done. They will have no organization until the emergency arises.

Mr. PROCTOR (reading):

> There is no doubt that by this expedient we will save months of valuable time in the organization of a very considerable force, but so far as the National Guard is concerned, it will make no difference, because under the bill the National Guard organizations come first.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, as I understand it, the crucial point raised is whether these 100,000 men who have served in some war are to be enrolled, and when they are so enrolled whether without their own volition they are to be put into the Army of the United States in time of war. If that be true, then of course I think the bill ought to be modified.

Mr. PROCTOR. No.

Mr. ALLISON. But I do not understand that it is true.

Mr. PROCTOR. Not at all.

Mr. ALLISON. But the letter written by the Secretary of War seems to imply——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, it is impossible to hear the Senator from Iowa on this side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa will suspend for one moment. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to allow us a few minutes longer—say thirty minutes.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the bill been read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has.

Mr. COCKRELL. If there is to be no discussion, let us take a vote.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following telegram, and I desire to have it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that a telegram be read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

SHAWNEE, OKLA., December 15, 1902.

M. S. QUAY, United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The people are with you in your fight for statehood. We know the Indian Territory is not ready for statehood. The Nelson amendment means no statehood. Ninety per cent of our people are for statehood.

C. M. CADE,
Chairman Territory Republican Committee.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, the Senator from Vermont in charge of the bill just now laid aside suggests that it would be to the advantage of the Senate probably that the present discussion should continue for thirty minutes. I desire to say that so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the Senate going on for thirty minutes with the discussion of the militia bill, with the understanding that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] takes the floor at the conclusion of thirty minutes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That will be done.

Mr. QUAY. At half past 2.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, sir; laying the bill temporarily aside, and the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] will be ready to proceed at that time, as he is ready to proceed now.

Mr. QUAY. At half past 2.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request has not been made.

Mr. QUAY. I suggest or request that the bill go over for thirty minutes, until half past 2.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask that that be agreed to by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside for thirty minutes and that the consideration of the militia bill, so called, be proceeded with. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, the entire difficulty about this bill is due, in my judgment, to the provision found on page 16, commencing in line 2 and ending in line 14. I do not deem that provision necessary to make the bill effective. I think there is perhaps just objection to it, for it is a provision that authorizes, or at least appears to authorize, the organization, encampment, and drilling of this reserve force before it is called out for active military purposes. I move that that portion of the bill be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is an amendment now pending.

Mr. FORAKER. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. HALE. What lines does the Senator from Ohio include in his amendment?

Mr. FORAKER. I would commence in line 2, on page 16, and strike out down to the end of the sentence in line 14. The language that would be stricken out reads as follows:

The persons so enrolled shall report for drill, inspection, and instruction at such times and places to be specified and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and each person so reporting shall, during the time of such service, be subject, as far as practicable, to the regulations and discipline governing the military establishment and shall be entitled to the same pay and allowances as are or may be provided by law for the Army of the United States, to be paid out of the appropriation for the pay of the Army, but in time of peace, except in case of threatened invasion, said national volunteer reserve shall not be required to perform military duty to exceed ten days in any one year.

Now, that language has no proper place in this bill unless it is contemplated that there shall be organization before war makes the calling out of this force necessary, and that whenever there is organization then shall follow the encampment and the drill and the discipline, not to exceed ten days of encampment in any one year in time of peace.

That is inconsistent with the statement made by the Secretary of War, as I thought, in the committee. I have no doubt whatever but that so long as the present Secretary continues in office this law would be administered according to his interpretation, which is that there shall be no organization, no calling out, no encamping, no drilling, and no disciplining, and therefore no pay and no charge to anybody, except only in the emergeney of war, and that there will be no attempt to organize in advance of that. But another Secretary might not feel bound by his interpretation of this statute; and I think anyone coming to interpret this statute would find in this language ample justification for organizing in anticipation of war and putting troops into camp and drilling them not to exceed ten days in any one year in time of peace.

Mr. HALE. That——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will yield with pleasure. If that should be stricken out. then the provision would be in its entirety, so far as this national volunteer reserve force is concerned, first, that it should be enrolled. Then there would be simply 100,000 names in the Office of the Secretary of War of men who had seen service, and who had, when they volunteered, stipulated that they would render three years of active service, and in the contingency of being called for in case of war or emergency, they would render an additional service not exceeding nine months, and that they would submit, being called out in case of war, to organization and discipline and drill and all the other duties that might properly be exacted of soldiers organized as volunteers for the defense of the Government. Now I yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator; I only want to say right here that it is the very provisions which the Senator proposes to strike out which troubled some of us in the view of the Senator's statement that this was to be an inert force. Is there any doubt whatever in the Senator's mind that if you keep this section in any Secretary might enforce an organization and ten days' drill every year?

Mr. FORAKER. It seemed to me that it admitted of that construction. I asked the Secretary of War, when he was before the committee, in regard to it. His answer was as I have indicated. I have not undertaken to quote his language exactly, but his statement was that it was not contemplated to organize this force or to officer it except only in case of war or other emergency making it necessary to call it into service, and then, of course, it would be organized as a volunteer force.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to say right here, if the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me just a moment, while I have it in mind, in answer to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], that while this reserve is a part of the militia, in the sense that all men are a part of the militia who are between the ages of 18 and 45, it is not a part of the militia in any other sense. When these men enlist, the Secretary may, if he sees fit, require this further conditional enlistment.

The enrolling is not in violation of the Constitution. The mere registration of 100,000 names in the Office of the Secretary of War is not prohibited. Mere enrollment or mere enlistment is not prohibited when for the volunteer service. And while enlistment for three years of active service is conceded to be constitutional, certainly also it must be conceded that an enlistment at the same time not only for three years of actual service, but for five years, the additional liability to render nine months' service in a certain contingency is not prohibited.

So I do not see anything here that violates the Constitution. The only thing I had apprehension about was a provision that it seemed to me authorized the organization and the encampment and the drilling, at the expense of the Government, of this entire reserve force in time of peace for a period in each year not exceeding ten days. Now, if that should go out it would require that they should be enrolled, and whenever there was war the Secretary of War would have their names and addresses, and he would be authorized to call them at once into the service. Then they would be organized, and, according to the provision of the bill, would be subjected to the rules and regulations of war governing the volunteer force when in service.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the language which the Senator from Ohio moves to eliminate from this section is the language which I rose, improperly I admit, while the Senator from Alabama had the floor, to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to. I think if the language which he moves to strike out were stricken out the remainder of the section would be altogether futile. I think his amendment would destroy essentially whatever of wise object may be behind the section.

I agree entirely with the Senator from Alabama that the section as it is drawn contemplates no mere registration of men who could serve to the advantage of the United States, having seen prior service either in the Regular or in the Volunteer Army. It seems to me very clear that it contemplates, as the Senator from Alabama contends, an enlistment in the beginning for a term of service which shall be five years. That the word "enrolled" when used in connection with the military service is defined in the dictionary to involve enlistment. A registration of men for five years as constituting a list of men who have seen service and who therefore would be available would be a very anomalous performance.

Mr. BACON. All of those would be enrolled anyhow.

Mr. SPOONER. Mere registration would impose no duty whatever upon the person registered. It would involve no obligation upon his part whatever. It means evidently an enlistment. Almost every line of the section implies that. It provides that—

Such enrollment shall in each case continue for a period of five years, but in the event they shall be called into the service of the United States, other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction—

There is an implication that they are in the service of the United States during ten days of each year for inspection, drill, and instruction; and that is the intention of the provision, for it says they shall report subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; they shall report at such places as he prescribes, and, moreover, they are to be paid as for military service during that ten days out of the appropriation made each year, or every two years, for the regular military establishment in the Army appropriation bill. Any other provision than this, if there is anything in the bill at all, or any purpose in the section, would be nonsensical. To speak of it as a mere enrollment, a mere registration, a mere list of men who have served, to whom application may be made some time in an exigency to serve again, is not what this section contemplates, and would be very futile and nonsensical legislation for Congress to indulge in. These men are to be subject to the military discipline which prevails in the Army.

This section provides also for an enrollment of five years, and that the men shall be entitled to discharge. It provides for no other enlistment, and, as you will see if you will turn to lines 3, 4, and 5, at the top of page 17, they are left no option as to whether, when Congress provides otherwise, they will go into the service or not. They are in the service so far as the obligation goes. They can be compelled to report and punished for not reporting under the provisions of this bill.

Now, if you strike out the language suggested by the Senator from Ohio, you have the enrollment, you have the term of enrollment, but during the whole period of five years you have no instruction, you have no inspection, you have no discipline. These men may not meet during the period, and they are no more prepared and not so well prepared as are the regular militia.

In my view, this force would not constitute a part of the organized militia of the State, and Congress has not the power to provide, as I understand, for officering the militia regiments or troops through appointment by the President, because the Constitution provides distinctly—so careful was it to keep the control of the militia of the States in the States—that there should be reserved to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers where the militia is called into the service of the United States.

I can not see anything to be accomplished by this section with the provision here stricken out which would insure drill, inspection, and discipline, which means some organization—an organization sufficient for those purposes.

There is another thing that I do not understand about this bill——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BACON. I just want to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question before he leaves that particular part of the subject.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I also desire to ask a question.

Mr. BACON. Under the view expressed by the Senator as to the effect of this section, I desire to ask him if necessarily, in his opinion, as the result of that view, this force provided for in section 24 is not a reserve force of the Regular Army?

Mr. SPOONER. A reserve force of the United States as contradistinguished—yes; you may call it that——

Mr. BACON. A reserve force of the Regular Army, necessarily.

Mr. SPOONER. But, at any rate, it is a reserve force of the United States, I think, as contradistinguished from any militia.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. Before the Senator leaves that point, I want to say that it has been contemplated all along by the framers of this bill that this particular force would be drilled and disciplined to such an extent that an annual encampment and drill would not be necessary. A man who has served three years in the Regular Army certainly would not need to be called into service ten days in every year to learn the manual of arms or to go through with the various military evolutions.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, when I contrast the manual of arms of to-day and the tactics of to-day with the tactics of 1862, 1863, and 1864, I have discovered that a man accustomed to the old-fashioned tactics has a great deal to learn.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator will agree with me that the manual of arms as we have it to-day is not only quite different, but certainly much easier to learn than the old manual of arms, for to-day they go through with it in "any old way."

Mr. SPOONER. A man accustomed to the old manual of arms would have to learn the present one anew

Mr. FORAKER. However that may be, I simply wanted to interrupt the Senator to say that it was the idea of the framers of this bill, as I understand, and those who advocate it, and it was the idea of the Secretary of War, that these men would not need this annual encampment—this annual drill—in order to make them a desirable reserve force, but that whenever they are called into service in two or three weeks they would pick up the manual or pick up the drill again, they having been for years in the service and accustomed to drill.

Mr. SPOONER. I think, if the section is a good section at all in respect to this national reserve force, that there should be provision for the inspection, drill, and instruction of the men, and I think, also, that they should be—and that was what was contemplated by the bill and that portion of the section as here drawn, which is harmonious and adapted to the accomplishment of the purposes the draftsmen evidently had in view—compensated during a time not exceeding ten days of the drill. It is quite an absurd proposition to me that a national reserve force, apportioned to the States, of 100,000 should never during this five-year period be expected to touch elbows, to receive instruction in modern military methods, or to be subjected to any discipline or organization whatever.

They can not be called out in time of peace for over ten days in any one year, and the men would not get out of the militia, and they could not under this bill, because this bill provides that no person shall belong to both organizations at the same time. So the moment a man is enrolled out of these 100,000 men in this national volunteer reserve force, and during the period while he is a member of that force, he is not, under the provisions of this bill, and can not be a member, either as an officer, a noncommissioned officer, or a private soldier, of the militia. He has taken himself out by his enlistment or enrollment, which is a voluntary thing; and under this language—I think it means more than a mere list—he has taken himself out from an opportunity of drill with the National Guards or with the unorganized militia.

Now, what is the object, I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill, of this national volunteer reserve force?

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to read the answer of the Secretary of War to that question?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; but I am not willing to stipulate that I will consider it an answer.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not ask the Senator to consider it an answer that would be satisfactory to him, but it was the answer given by the Secretary of War to that identical question. The Senator asked the question of the chairman of the committee, and I call the attention of the chairman to page 7 of the report of the hearings, if he desires to read it, or shall I read it?

Mr. SPOONER. I will yield to the Senator with the permission of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. PROCTOR. In answer to a question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] the Secretary of War said:

> Mr. ROOT. I propose hereafter when a man enlists he shall sign a paper agreeing to serve in the Army for three years, as he does now, and under which he is available for five years more, ready to answer a call, if he is called out; and we have also an enlistment under which when a man has served as long as he thinks he wants to in the active force of the National Guard he can put himself on this five-year roll as a man who is ready to be called out in case a volunteer force is called out. We now graduate from the Army in round numbers from 15,000 to 20,000 young men who have served their enlistment and have gone out and gone into civil life. If a war comes along they all want to come back, only we do not know where they are, and instead of being able to get track of them we have to take the men as they come, men who have training and men who are new and raw. Any man always has interest enough in militia affairs to serve in the National Guard and when a war comes wants to be in it.

Then he goes on to elaborate that same idea that the purpose is to get track of the men who have seen service, who have been drilled, who have been disciplined, and who, coming into camp on a call of that kind, would in a few days be again efficient soldiers.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has read what is the purpose of the Secretary of War, but, of course, in passing on this bill, we are passing upon it; we have to construe it as lawyers, and each of us is obliged to act upon his own judgment as to what it would mean if enacted into law. The Secretary testified that he understood this enrollment to involve an agreement to serve.

Mr. FORAKER. Only an agreement to serve when the force is called out by authority of Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Take the bill as it reads, and take the section as a whole as it reads, and it certainly would involve an enlistment. "To enroll," as I said a little while ago, used in that connection, means "to enlist; to write in a roll or register; to insert a name or enter in a list or catalogue; hence to record; to insert in records; as to enroll men for service; and also, reflexively, to enlist."

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. BURROWS. I think it would be wise perhaps to read the next statement to that, where the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] left off, which is as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. You propose to enlist the men in the Regular Army three years and five years for volunteer reserve, and this is a part of the enlistment paper?
Mr. ROOT. Part of the enlistment paper.

So they enlist.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; they enlist.

Mr. BURROWS. In the Regular Army for three years and in the volunteer reserve force for five years, and the enlistment papers so specify.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that would be involved in the language.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from Michigan might have read on a little further. The Secretary amplifies in that direction.

Mr. SPOONER. If I were to vote for that section, I should vote against the proposed motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] to strike out these provisions for drill, inspection, and instruction ten days during each year of the five-year period of enlistment, with the pay provided for that service, for it is a service. If they obtained no pay, of course they would not come, as militiamen are paid for a similar service.

I supposed when I first read this section that the object of it was to secure to the United States, in the event of war, a force, sufficiently organized to be rendered quickly available, of men at once ready, more so than the militia.

Mr. FORAKER. I had the same impression.

Mr. SPOONER. And who would be expected to be at once ready to take the field, familiar with the work of the soldier. Is that the object of it?

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask the Senator to yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The organized militia in a body is the first force to be called upon, and then this reserve of volunteers.

Mr. SPOONER. That is what surprises me. If this force, being a force of men who have seen service, a force of men who by ten days' drill for five years become disciplined, familiar with the modern school of the soldier, under pay, and all that, ready upon call for any military duty, is what is desired, I can not see why that should be made supplementary to the militia, a large portion of whom may never, and naturally would never, have seen any active service in war at all outside of the company drill and the regimental and battalion drill at periods during the year.

Mr. HALE. If the Senator will allow me, here is something to which I desire to call his attention.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us get through with this other thing first, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. HALE. This is what I am after.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] who yielded to me will consent, I will yield to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no; let the Senator from Vermont go on.

Mr. PROCTOR. The National Guard is in full organization; it is already created and would naturally be first called upon if wanted for a limited time, and then the militia would be called upon. The Secretary of War says in regard to that:

The National Guard is practically made a first reserve so far as it elects to become so, while the proposed enrollment of veterans practically takes the place of a second or volunteer reserve, to be called into service only when any other volunteer organization would be called into service, and the great effect produced being that after the Regular Army and after the National Guard we shall have a volunteer force, the first regiments of which are composed of experienced and trained soldiers who have seen service and have then gone back to civil life.

Mr. HALE. Right here is an interesting part of this testimony that ought to be read carefully by all of us:

Mr. FORAKER. The provisions for the organization of this national volunteer reserve before you call it into the service—or is there any provision beyond the mere enrollment?
Mr. COCKRELL. I think he said we would have to work that out.
Mr. FORAKER. It would seem to me you ought to have authority to enroll and organize.

Not simply to enroll, but to enroll and organize.

Mr. ROOT. There is no provision for it beyond that which is contained in the provision that they shall not be called out except for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction, and the idea has been that there would be very little of that. The main thing necessarily would be to keep track of the men and know where we could call on them, and their individual work would be chiefly reporting where they were, instead of instruction, so that we can keep track of them.

That seems to run in the same line as the idea of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. SPOONER. We are not asked to vote on the testimony of the Secretary of War, but we are asked to vote for a bill, and we shall have to construe it for ourselves.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SPOONER. The thing I do not understand in this provision, and that is in the mind of the Secretary in his testimony here, is this: It is intended to have a body of men—and there may be wisdom in that from a certain view point—not officered by the governors of the States, but officered by the President of the United States, when officered at all, who would perhaps be drilled by men naturally detailed by the Secretary of War, or the Adjutant-General by order of the Secretary of War, for drill, inspection, and all that, a band of men who have been examined, for they are to be examined before they are enrolled, I think——

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. They must be men who have seen active military service, and it is to be a body of men who must come under the provisions of this section, when the President calls them out, and go where the President orders. They can be sent to any country beyond the confines of the United States and to points not within the jurisdiction of the United States when the honor of the country or any military exigency demands it.

Mr. PROCTOR. When called for under the authority of Congress.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course, when called for under the authority of Congress; but under this bill, no matter how much they are needed, notwithstanding their examination, notwithstanding their drill, notwithstanding their prior service, notwithstanding they are officered by choice soldiers chosen by the President of the United States, the militia force is to be called out first, and these men afterwards. Why is that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin will please suspend.

Mr. SPOONER. I suspend entirely, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will resume consideration of the statehood bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I suspend.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that tomorrow, immediately after the routine morning business, I shall again call up this bill for consideration.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. The statehood bill is now, I believe, before the Senate, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is, and the Senator from Pennsylvania is recognized.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, before the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] proceeds with his remarks, I desire to call the attention of the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], who was originally in charge of the bill reported by the Committee on Territories, to the abnormal and anomalous condition of the question that is now pending in the Senate.

A the last session, by unanimous consent, we agreed that on the 3d of December a report should be made upon the bill by the Committee on Territories and that on the 10th of December the bill should be taken up for discussion and be proceeded with. On the 3d of December no written report was made by the majority of the Committee on Territories, but a bill was reported entirely changing the substance of the bill which had been referred to the Committee on Territories and was to be laid before the Senate on the 10th of December, when the discussion (or vote upon the bill, if there was no discussion) would be had or taken.

On the 10th of December the written report of the majority of the committee came into the Senate. It was a labored report. It arraigned the Constitution of the United States; it arraigned national legislation for the last century, and proceeded further to sustain the bill which the distinguished Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] had reported on the 3d of December.

Immediately upon its conclusion, suddenly and tumultuously, the Senator from Minnesota withdrew his bill; abiit, evasit, irrupit, as the classic says. Like Catiline, he said: "I go, but I return;" and he has gone, but he has not returned. I think it is fair now that the Senator from Minnesota should say to the Senate whether or not he is going to rereport that bill; and if so, at what time. As it is, we are to proceed here to discuss a bill that is not before the Senate if we are to discuss the report of the Committee on Territories.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, in reply to the honorable Senator from Pennsylvania, I beg leave to say that at the proper time I shall again offer that substitute, slightly modified, as an amendment to this bill, but just when I am not prepared to say. I shall be glad to hear the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and others, in the meantime as to the quality of that substitute, and after I have heard objections from the other side I shall be better prepared to know what changes and modifications to make in the substitute. At present, however, I am not prepared to offer it, but will do so in due time.

Mr. QUAY. Nor can the Senator from Minnesota, as I understand, mention any specific time.

Mr. NELSON. Not at this time.

Mr. QUAY. May I ask him whether it is his belief that the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania will have any influence on the character of his report?

Mr. NELSON. I am always open to receive anything the Senator from Pennsylvania says in a Christian spirit.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania favor the committee with an extended discussion of his views on this subject?

Mr. QUAY. I very probably will before this debate is over, but I am not certain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will say for the majority of the committee that they will be perfectly delighted to hear the Senator.

Mr. QUAY. I am not committed upon that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the Senator is committed upon that question.

Mr. QUAY. I say I am not committed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is not willing, then, to name a time when he will favor the committee with his extended views?

Mr. QUAY. He is not, Mr. President. The Senator from Pennsylvania is not one of the wranglers of this Senate, except upon very special occasions. I am not prepared to say that I will make any remarks upon this question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. QUAY. So far as I am concerned, I do not think any discussion is likely to change my views upon it, as enunciated by the national Republican convention, in consonance with the views of the Senator from Indiana at that time, and I am ready for a vote at any time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is a statement that I have heard, perhaps, before. It is not new. I had simply understood the Senator from Pennsylvania to say that he would favor the Senate with an extended presentation of his views upon this subject, and I merely wanted to know whether or not the Senator could indicate a time when he would do so.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Indiana entirely misunderstood and directly misunderstood and misquoted the remark of the Senator from Pennsylvania. On the contrary, the Senator from Pennsylvania said he might address the Senate, but would not commit himself upon that question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, of course I shall not press the Senator from Pennsylvania to commit himself upon so grave a subject, and I have no desire further to delay the discussion this afternoon.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I have been asked by the Committee on Territories to open this debate by calling the attention of the Senate to some of the facts disclosed by the evidence taken by the subcommittee in its recent trip through the Territories seeking admission as States under the provisions of the omnibus bill.

I feel the importance of any action which may be taken from the fact that this bill provides for the admission at once into the Union of three large Territories as States. It is an unusual measure, and unusual in its importance. We might regard it of supreme importance if we were to consider simply the admission of one State into the Union, but when an omnibus bill is presented providing for the admission of three States, a situation is presented which demands the wisest consideration at the hands of this great body.

The history of the application of two of these Territories, Arizona and New Mexico, for admission has been peculiar. Repeatedly they have rapped at the doors of Congress and as repeatedly admission has been denied them, although in almost every instance there has been a favorable report from the Committee on Territories. When, therefore, this bill came before the committee, the members felt that they ought to give extraordinary examination to the conditions existing in each of the Territories and so be able to report to the Senate whether they possess these elements of statehood which has been claimed for them.

It was for the purpose of ascertaining the facts that the subcommittee visited the Territories. It is regrettable that they did not have more time to devote to the work, but it must be obvious to the Senate that the members were unable to undertake it until after the November elections, and the order of the Senate that the report be made on the third day of the session required the return of the subcommittee by that time.

We met in Chicago. We made our trip from that point. We occupied fifteen days in doing so. We visited every town it was possible to visit during that time; we could not visit all because of the great distances we had to travel. I never before realized the size of these Territories or the distances that must be traversed between towns.

Mr. MCCOMAS. Will the Senator permit me? Did the subcommittee visit all of the Territories?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We visited all three of the Territories. Take New Mexico as an illustration. It was stated to the committee—and I presume accurately—that the Territory covers an area as great as that of New England, New York, and New Jersey combined, and yet the census for 1900 mentions only five or six incorporated towns in that entire area having a population greater than 2,500 each. The towns named are Albuquerque (city), Gallup (town), Las Vegas, Raton, and Santa Fe. I do not know but that Silver City was also included.

The distance from Raton, where the committee entered the Territory, to Las Vegas is 111 miles, from that point to Santa Fe it is 83 miles, and from there to Albuquerque it is 84 miles. Had we gone from Albuquerque south to Lascruces, as we were invited to do, we would have traveled a distance of 210 miles. Instead of that the subcommittee, after visiting Raton, Albuquerque, Las Vegas, and Santa Fe, proceeded west into Arizona, going south through Arizona, coming back to Lascruces, in New Mexico, and afterwards going north through the Pecos Valley on their way to Oklahoma.

After visiting Albuquerque we were compelled to make a journey of 547 miles, crossing one of the southern spurs of the Continental Divide to reach Prescott, Ariz. Going from Prescott south to Phoenix, the next town mentioned in the census report as containing more than 2,500 inhabitants, was a distance of 137 miles by rail, from Phoenix to Tucson was 120 miles, and from Tucson to Bisbee, the great mining camp, was a distance of 109 miles.

The distance from there to Las Cruces was 252 miles; from there to Carlsbad, 346 miles, and from Carlsbad to Woodward, in Oklahoma Territory, was a distance of 455 miles.

I give these figures simply to indicate the great distances we had to travel and the application we were obliged to make during the time we were in the various towns in order to gather up the information which the committee deemed desirable in the consideration of the question involved.

Before leaving Chicago, in fact during the first session of this Congress, at meetings of the committee held in Washington, we listened to Delegate RODEY, of New Mexico; Delegate SMITH, of Arizona, and Delegate FLYNN, of Oklahoma, and various other persons introduced by the Delegates, but further information was desired.

In each Territory we asked that three persons be selected to present to the committee the claims of such Territories for statehood. In New Mexico there appeared before us Delegate RODEY, the Hon. William P. Childers, United States attorney for that Territory, also the Hon. Thomas Hughes, editor of the Albuquerque Citizen. When we went into Arizona, Hon. Benjamin H. Fowler, of Phoenix, and ex-Judge Joseph H. Kibbey, and the governor of the Territory appeared before us, as well as others. In Oklahoma Governor Ferguson made an elaborate statement, and ex-Governor Barnes presented his views. We called also in New Mexico all of the judges of the United States courts and asked them to make comprehensive statements regarding the conditions existing in the Territory as they observed them in their work, and there appeared before us the chief judge, William J. Mills, Judges McFie, Parker, Baker, and McMillan. In Arizona Judge Sloan made a most exhaustive statement regarding conditions in that Territory, and in Oklahoma Judge Strong did the same for his Territory.

We also listened to large numbers of representative citizens who came before us either on the suggestion of friends of statehood or voluntarily. We also sought information from the Territorial superintendent of education in New Mexico, Mr. Chaves; also the superintendents and teachers of schools in Las Vegas and in Albuquerque and in other towns that we visited. In two of the towns, Albuquerque and Las Vegas, members of the committee visited the schools in person and inspected their work. In Arizona Governor Brodie, President Adams, of the University of Arizona, Mr. Layton, superintendent of the schools of Phoenix, and Superintendent Angus, of Tucson, appeared before the committee and made statements regarding educational matters in that Territory.

In Arizona we also called before the committee Hon. Frank Murphy, the great railroad builder of that Territory, and received from him a statement regarding all of the roads now in operation, those in progress of construction, and regarding the time when those last named would be completed. He also discussed the business interests of Arizona which were demanding the construction of new roads.

We also called before us Mr. Dwight P. Heard, one of the water-storage commissioners, a resident of Phoenix, which is probably the best-watered section in any of the Southwestern Territories. That gentleman was in Washington last winter seeking legislation authorizing Maricopa County to bond itself to the extent of two and a half million dollars for the purpose of storing waters for use in and about Phoenix, where there are now ditches, but an insufficient quantity of water to fully supply them.

We also called before us Mr. Frank G. Tracy, president of the Pecos Irrigation Company, and heard him at length; and after our return to Washington we have had before the committee Professor Newell, from the office of the Geological Survey, whose very valuable testimony, based not only upon personal observation, but upon an extended investigation by the Department during many years, regarding the climatic conditions of Arizona and New Mexico, the volume of the water supply, and the extent to which it can be utilized, may be found in the volume of printed testimony accompanying the committee's report.

We went further than this. It having been stated to us by Delegate RODEY that the census, in his judgment, was inaccurate and misleading, that it failed to do justice to the Territory of New Mexico, we made special inquiry as to the soundness of this claim. We called before us the Territorial supervisor of the census. In every place we visited we subpœnaed all the census enumerators whom we were able to reach by process, and inquired of them as to the methods adopted and the results reached. We also called out information from all the sources at our command, particularly in New Mexico, which has a large Mexican population, regarding the language used by the masses; that which was most in use, the character of the population, their education, their intelligence, their habits, the modes adopted in legal proceedings, and the language used; also the language used in political speeches and at nominating conventions, in an effort on our part to secure information regarding the vexed question of the intelligence and the fitness for statehood of the great mass of the people of the Territory of New Mexico.

To these various ends we also called the judges of the courts; we called the clerks of the courts; we called interpreters; we called justices of the peace, by whom the petty offenses are tried; and in this way we feel that, considering the length of time in which we had to do it, we have accomplished a work which ought to be of value to the Senate. The testimony taken has been presented in printed form, well indexed, both in respect of names and of topics. I trust that the Senators will pay us the compliment of carefully looking through this evidence.

Now, Mr. President, having done this work and presented this evidence, we have prepared and presented the report, which has already been read in this body.

The first question to be considered and determined is this: Has the Territory of New Mexico a population sufficiently large to warrant Congress in admitting her to a place in the Union of States with equal representation in this body?

By the census of 1900 its population was 195,310. It is claimed by Delegate RODEY that there is a population of at least 300,000 in that Territory, and that the census was entirely unreliable. On the other hand, one of the gentlemen who appeared before us in New Mexico as a representative of that Territory, Mr. Childers, the United States attorney, whom I have already mentioned, said, frankly, in his statement:

> I do not claim the same amount of population that some of my friends in the Territory do. I like to be more accurate in the statement of facts. I think we have enough to entitle us to statehood. I do not think it is necessary to claim more than we have.
> I will take the census for it and stand upon the census. I think possibly that we may have a little more than the census gives us. I have a little doubt, too, that we have a little more.

That was as broad as Mr. Childers would make his statement. In further consideration of this subject we called the supervisor of the census, as before stated, and in all the towns where we stopped we caused to be brought before us all available census enumerators who served in the towns where complaints were specially made, many of whom served also in the country districts, some of them as far out as 40 miles from the point where we summoned them. Relying upon the statement of Mr. Childers and the representation of other conservative men and the facts brought out in examination of the census enumerators, the committee are unable to say that there is any material error to be found in that census. It is undoubtedly true that no census is absolutely correct, nor can it be made so. But the committee believe from all the testimony before them and from their observation that the census returns as made are substantially correct.

Now, then, is the population of New Mexico sufficient in numbers to warrant her admission as a State?

Upon this question I call attention to the rule contained in the ordinance of 1787 regarding the population then thought necessary, in Territories carved out of the Northwest Territory, before they should be considered eligible for admission as States; also to a discussion of the question as to what rule should now be adopted.

> "Whenever any of said States shall have 60,000 free inhabitants therein such State shall be admitted, by its Delegates, into the Congress of the United States on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, and shall be at liberty to form a permanent constitution and State government."
> It is thus seen that the fathers, even in the eighteenth century, provided—

"SIXTY-THOUSAND RULE" BASIS FOR SLIDING SCALE.

This number, however, was not intended to be a permanent requisite, but a standard referring to the population of the rest of the nation at the time. By comparing 60,000 (the number of people required for statehood in 1787) with the population of the nation at that time we find the ratio which statesmen of that day deemed essential as between communities applying for statehood and the nation itself. At that time the population of the United States was less than 4,000,000. If 60,000 were required as the first requisite for statehood when the population of the nation was less than 4,000,000, the same rule would require a population at the present time of over 1,153,000; and every reason supporting the rule of 60,000 established by the fathers' ordinance of 1787 requires as many more than 60,000 now as the population of the nation itself at present is larger than it was one hundred and fifteen years ago.

In fixing the boundaries of three of the States of the Northwest Territory authors of that ordinance also established a precedent in favor—

First, of large areas in any future State and against small areas; and

Second, in favor of natural and scientific boundaries and against accidental and eccentric boundaries.

Could the vast development west of the Mississippi River have been foreseen at that time, it is plain from the precedent established in fixing the boundaries of the States of the Northwest Territory that the fathers would have indicated yet much more comprehensive boundaries; for if States as large as Illinois, Indiana, and Ohio were the least which the nation required of any communities coming into it at a time when the nation was confined to the thirteen original States, it is plain that still larger areas would be required when the nation has grown as it has grown during the successive periods of its history.

"UNIT OF REPRESENTATION" RULE.

This rule was observed down to the admission of Michigan and was referred to by President Jackson in his message of December 9, 1835. That the rule of 60,000 was not considered permanent, because too small, is shown by the fact that in the admission of Kansas the new rule was introduced that the population of the new State shall at least equal the unit of representation in the House of Representatives. This rule has not been observed, and was neither scientific nor based upon the principle of a popular government for the nation.

For, despite the fact that the different sizes of the thirteen colonies and the insistence by ambitious men from the smaller States for an equal representation in the Senate with the larger ones compelled the anomalous compromise by which small States secured as large a vote in the Senate as the large ones, nevertheless the general theory, of course, was that there should be a government by population and not by area. It was intended that the Senate should never be a large body, but yet that, remaining a small body, it should still stand for a quantity of people and not a quantity of land. For it was universally agreed that the Senate should always remain as small as possible numerically, the reasons for its existence and the elements of its usefulness in our scheme of government demanding this.

ARIZONA FAILS ON EITHER RULE; NEW MEXICO JUST WITHIN THE LATTER RULE AND NO MORE.

But measured even by the rule adopted in the case of Kansas, unscientific as it is and negativing as it does the very purpose and reasons of the organization of the Senate, Arizona is not (and New Mexico is only just within the rule) at present entitled to admission into the Union. For the unit of representation, according to the census of 1900, is 194,182; and Arizona, by the census of 1900, has 122,931, and New Mexico 195,310.

Measured by the statesmanlike rule laid down in the ordinance of 1787 as applied to existing conditions, both Arizona and New Mexico fall far short of the required population, while Oklahoma and the Indian Territory about measure up to it, but no more; for the population of Arizona, by the census of 1900, is 122,931, that of New Mexico is 195,310, while that of Oklahoma is 398,331, and the Indian Territory 392,060, or together 790,391; and it requires only a personal inspection of those two Territories to demonstrate that since the census of 1900 was taken tens of thousands of immigrants have arrived there and established homes.

NEW RULE SUGGESTED.

But if neither of the above guides be observed in forming our judgment as to the number of people required to make a new State and the whole subject be submitted anew to the good sense of Congress, the committee are quite as emphatic in their opinion that neither New Mexico nor Arizona are at the present moment entitled to statehood. For the Republic is now a nation of over 76,000,000 people. Every policy which affects the national well-being of these 76,000,000 is within the power of each State equally with every other State, because every measure must pass the Senate as well as the House before becoming a law; and matters of vital national concern are determined by the Senate alone, in conjunction with the Executive Department. While, therefore, it is not contended that any new State should be as large in population as any existing State, it is contended that it should be large enough to bear some fair proportion to the population of the remainder of the Republic.

Indeed, it would have been well, and would now be well, if the rule could be adopted that any new State should have a population equal to the average population of the remainder of the States. This rule would require a population for any proposed new State, at the present time, of 1,650,000, and, as has been stated, New Mexico's population is 195,310 and that of Arizona is 122,931.

In this connection it may be profitable, Mr. President, to know what proportion the population of certain States, at the time of their admission to the Union, bore to the population of the entire nation at the time of their admission. The first two States to be admitted were Vermont and Kentucky. Vermont contained 2.2 per cent of the entire population of the nation and Kentucky 1.9 per cent.

Missouri had seven-tenths of 1 per cent; Michigan had 1.2; Iowa, when admitted, had by the census of 1840 (she was admitted in 1845, I believe) three-tenths of 1 per cent, and by the census of 1850 eight-tenths of 1 per cent, showing a very rapid increase in her population; Wisconsin had 1.3 per cent.

Of the States more recently admitted, Kansas, Nebraska, and North Dakota each had three-tenths of 1 per cent, while South Dakota had five-tenths of 1 per cent. Taking Arizona with her population to-day and she has only two-tenths of 1 per cent, while New Mexico has twenty-five one hundredths of 1 per cent.

Mr. GALLINGER. How about Wyoming?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not the figures for Wyoming. I do not know how this list was made up. I found it somewhere.

From it, however, it appears that should Arizona and New Mexico be admitted at this time they will come in with a population smaller, when compared with the population of the nation, than any other of the States named.

The next important feature of this question is this: Are the conditions such that if these Territories are admitted at this time their population will increase as the population of other States has increased as in the past.

When Iowa was admitted, when Illinois was admitted, when any of the States of the great Central West were admitted—in fact, any of those I have just mentioned—everybody knew, they had common knowledge of the fact, that they were States upon which the early and the later rains fell; that they were States the soil of which had great fertility; that they were amply watered by natural causes, and that it would be only a short time when the enterprising people of America would crowd over the lines, take up the lands, build up the States, and make them great in all the elements of statehood.

Having such knowledge of the Territories so admitted, knowledge as to their soil, as to the humidity of the atmosphere, and knowing that they contained or were capable of developing all those elements which would eventually make them great States, it is easy to understand why those who were then in Congress were willing to admit them, although the population at that time bore a low percentage in comparison with the population of the older States.

New Mexico has been organized substantially for fifty years. Arizona has been organized for thirty-nine years, since 1863. They now present themselves for admission to the Union with the populations I have stated. On the other hand, here is Oklahoma, which was opened up to settlement only twelve or thirteen years ago, and yet the character of her soil was so well known and the amount of her rainfall so well verified that as soon as it was opened for settlement there was a grand rush of enterprising men from all the Central States of the Union. They took possession of the country, and to-day Oklahoma is a well-settled Territory, with magnificent farms, with fine buildings, well painted, with an ample stock of cattle, and with every element which constitutes a great agricultural State in our great aggregation of States.

Why have not New Mexico and Arizona, with their longer existence as Territories, developed in the same manner and to the same extent? Simply because their climatic condition is such that there can be no considerable agriculture in those Territories, except that which is built up by artificial irrigation, and when man attempts to solve the problem of general irrigation, with the obstacles which confront him in those Territories, he has undertaken a task which has challenged the best thought of the best thinkers on that region, and the problem is only solved in part at this time, and that a very small part.

The great moneyed institutions of the East seek Western investments, and money is loaned upon farm mortgages all through the Central Western States, and under Territorial government in Oklahoma you will find large numbers of loans made by moneyed institutions of the East, because they have faith in the soil, they have faith that the rains of heaven will descend upon it, that the crops will be abundant, that the interest upon the loans will be promptly met, and that the debt itself will be discharged in due season. But who has ever heard of money going into New Mexico or Arizona as a loan upon any farm, unless it be on one in the small irrigated areas?

Passing on, Mr. President, I again inquire, Has New Mexico the natural resources to entitle her to statehood at this time? I conceive that false impressions have been made upon the minds of very many men in this body regarding the resources of these two Territories. Such false impressions have come to myself. I have looked over the reports made by the Committee on Territories at different times, a package of which I now have in my hand, and I find that they are very largely made up of statements of those who were representing the Territories, extracts taken from the reports of the Territorial officers to the departments, extracts from speeches made by Senators and Representatives, and figures from the Census Office. One statement, quoted more than once in different years in different reports, was taken from the report of Governor Ross, of New Mexico, in 1887. As showing the character of that report and the impression which would naturally be created by it in a body like this, I beg leave to read it. He says:

Contrary to the popular impression in the East, a very large proportion of the lands of New Mexico are good agricultural lands, which will average well with those of any of the States East or West. A fair computation would put the mountainous portions at some 30,000,000 acres, the river valleys at 8,000,000, and the mesas at 40,000,000. On the mesas there are of course considerable areas that are impossible of cultivation, possibly 10,000,000 acres, while on the other hand there are in the mountainous districts many valleys and hill slopes, at altitudes of 4,000 to 8,000 feet above sea level, comprising some millions of acres, which are susceptible of successful cultivation, especially of all the small grains, all the common classes of vegetables, and of the hardier fruits. These valleys abound in the vicinity of the mining camps, which must always constitute for them a profitable market, while those valleys in turn, by their vegetable products, will materially contribute to the successful prosecution of mining by cheapening the cost of living, and thus the cost of mining. So that at least one-half the area of New Mexico is susceptible of a high state of cultivation and successful farming. The river valleys especially are rarely equaled anywhere in productive energy.

When you remember, Mr. President, that this Territory contains 78,000,000 acres of land, and in this report at least 39,000,000 acres of land are represented as susceptible of a high state of cultivation and successful farming, is it any wonder that committees have been deceived? That is equal to one-half the area of Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana all put together. And yet if that report is to be believed New Mexico has that area which can be made available.

As long ago as 1889, the very year Governor Ross was making that report, Major Powell, representing the Geological Survey, testified. He had not then made that thorough examination and research that have since been made in respect of existing conditions in those Territories, but upon such an examination as had at that time been made by the Government he testified that taking the whole arid region of the West, about 15 per cent—not half, mind you, but about 15 per cent—could be redeemed. When? When all the water is used; when all the streams are utilized.

Mr. TELLER. Who testified to that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Major Powell testified to it before a Senate committee in 1887.

Mr. TELLER. Had he made a full examination?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; he said that he had not made an examination such as has been made since that time, but he was of the opinion that about 15 per cent of the entire arid region could be reclaimed, but that in New Mexico only about 7½ per cent could in the end be irrigated.

Mr. TELLER. Fifteen per cent?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Taking the whole arid region of the West; but he said that in New Mexico only about 7½ per cent. Compare that with the 50 per cent mentioned by Governor Ross.

Now, Mr. Newell, who testified within the last fortnight, the gentleman who has had charge of the work in these Territories and whose testimony you will find on page 173 of this volume, says:

The Territory—

Of New Mexico—

is well within the arid region, and agriculture there is dependent almost entirely upon the artificial application of water.

The CHAIRMAN. By the artificial application of water you mean irrigation?

Mr. NEWELL. Yes, sir; irrigation. The principal source of supply is the Rio Grande and its largest tributary, the Pecos River. The United States Geological Survey has been measuring the flow of the Rio Grande where it enters New Mexico, and at various points along its course. We have also measured some of its tributaries, and have measured where it leaves the Territory to form the boundary line between Texas and the Republic of Mexico. We have been making studies of the extent to which that water can be used for irrigation purposes in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state to the committee the extent to which that water is used at present?

Mr. NEWELL. The usual summer supply is entirely employed, and there is now a considerable acreage under cultivation for which there is not a sufficient supply of water in all seasons. The spring flow—the floods—in large part go to waste, and water storage is absolutely essential to the future development of the Territory.

The chairman inquired:

I believe you said the other portion of the Territory where there was water was the Pecos, did you not?

Mr. NEWELL. The Pecos is the principal stream of eastern New Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the supply of that stream, and the availability of its water for irrigation, the character of the water, and other scientific facts which will enlighten the committee?

Mr. NEWELL. The Pecos drains an area of what is generally known as red beds, in which there is a good deal of gypsum, which is easily soluble in river water. The river itself is controlled by storage reservoirs. There is one at Lake McMillan, about 12 miles above Roswell, and a secondary one at Lake Avalon, nearer Roswell. Below that it receives water from springs, from the Hondo, and a number of other rivers, and the flow is increased. It is nearly all utilized in the canals between Roswell and Carlsbad. Below Carlsbad little water is taken from the river usually, the portion utilized being that taken out by the canals at Pecos City, south of the Territorial line, in Texas. The water, as it goes toward the Texas line, is heavily charged with gypsum, which is taken in solution from the soil through which the water flows. The storage capacity on Pecos River and the tributaries can doubtless be increased somewhat, but as to how much it can be increased no one knows at present.

Again he says:

The extreme northwestern portion along the San Juan River has a fairly good water supply, and there they raise, near Farmington, very valuable fruits; but the area of agricultural land is restricted. Outside of that area and a few other localities where springs and streams exist agriculture is impossible.

Again he was inquired of as to the area actually irrigated, and he gives these figures:

Total area of Territory, 78,374,400 acres; amount irrigated in 1889 was 203,893 acres, or 0.26 per cent.

There you have his statement that New Mexico is in the arid region, that it depends almost wholly upon irrigation in order to be brought into agriculture, and that by the last report only about 0.26 of 1 per cent had been brought under irrigation.

Mr. TELLER. When was that report made?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. At present. Those figures the Senator from Vermont is giving are for the present time.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But I see there must have been a misprint, because it says here 1889. I think it is a misprint. I will state that when Mr. Newell testified he said:

I do not recall the exact figures. They are published in a report prepared for the Twelfth Census. It is my impression that about one-fourth of 1 per cent of the area of the Territory is irrigated.

And later he will furnish those figures. That is the explanation of it.

Now, I have procured from the Census Office a table as to New Mexico by which it appears that the whole farm area of New Mexico is 5,130,000 acres, but that the improved farm area is only 326,873 acres, and I understand that includes the lands used for the range, where it is used in connection with a farm.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I think the Senator has misunderstood the figures. I do not think it is a fact that in any of the statements of farms it is the actual cultivated parts which are given. That is what we understand in the reports from my section of the country at least. What they may have done in other sections I do not know.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I certainly should not like to misrepresent the fact in that matter.

I will say in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado that I copied a statement from a census bulletin in respect to Arizona, not New Mexico, but I suppose the rule would be the same, where the note in the census report read as follows:

Under the general title "Farms" are included not only such tracts of tilled and untilled land as are commonly designated by that word in the older-settled States, but also the ranches of the owners of flocks and of herds. Of the latter there are many in Arizona. The proprietors of some of these ranches own large tracts of land upon which cattle and sheep are fed, while others who own little or no farm lands subsist their flocks and herds, often exclusively, upon the public domain or range. The land and agricultural resources of such ranges are classed as farms when of sufficient importance to require in their management the continued labor of one or more persons.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator will allow me, I think that of the 5,000,000 acres he speaks of as farms of course there would be some pasture land, but I can cite the Senator to a single individual in Mexico who owns a million and a half acres of pasture land, and good pasture land, and nobody would presume that that was a farm. There is no farm connected with it that I know of. What I want to call attention to is that three or four hundred thousand acres are actually cultivated land—plowed, harrowed, and cropped.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have a table here that I think will explain that matter entirely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me just a moment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That the statement of the Senator from Vermont is correct as to what is meant by farms in the census is proved by the fact that in Arizona there are only 185,000 acres under actual cultivation this year out of a total acreage of something over 73,000,000. The term "farms" used in the census was used and taken by the census as the Senator explained. Further, if the Senator will read the testimony of Professor Newell he will find that of the farms thus enumerated he has this year been over a large number of them in a portion of the Territory of New Mexico, and he found all their water holes dry.

Mr. TELLER. If I may be allowed, the conclusion of the Senator from Indiana is not borne out by the fact. It is true that this last year probably was the driest year ever known in the arid regions since it was settled, not only in New Mexico and Arizona, but in Colorado, Wyoming, and Utah; and yet, Mr. President, in these pasture lands there is abundance of feed for cattle.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The pasturage in Colorado is entirely different from the pasturage in New Mexico and Arizona, as appears from the testimony of Professor Newell.

Mr. TELLER. There is great similarity. I claim to have some acquaintance not only with Colorado, but with New Mexico and Arizona, Utah included, from actual observation myself.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Well, Mr. President, the table that was furnished me from the Census Office gives, first, the total farm area, whatever that may mean, as being 5,130,878 acres.

Mr. ELKINS. I would like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. If the argument of arid lands and climatic conditions is to be a bar now against the admission of New Mexico, why has it not been made a bar against the admission of ten or twelve other Territories, equally as arid, which during the last twenty-five years have been admitted into the Union and are now prosperous and growing States?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I was not in the Senate when those States were admitted, and perhaps the Senator himself can answer his own question better than I.

Mr. ELKINS. I can answer it satisfactorily, at least to myself. I do not see why a new rule is to be invoked and applied to a Territory whose people have suffered Territorial vassalage for fifty years, especially when, as a conquered people, they were promised under treaty obligations all the rights of American citizens, among them the right to be a State in the American Union.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is very evident that there has been some reason which has operated upon the Senate, and which has existed during that time, which has prevented these Territories from coming in, that did not exist in respect to the other Territories.

Mr. ELKINS. Not that New Mexico is arid. I never heard that before urged as a good and sufficient reason against statehood. I have heard the question discussed for twenty-seven years, and this is the first time this point has been raised, and this is not well taken in view of the fact that the General Government has inaugurated a system of irrigation which will make these great agricultural sections of the Union. Under a system of storage of water and irrigation these Territories will come in and be greater States and have greater agricultural facilities and greater agricultural wealth than many of the older States of the Union.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have heard that statement made repeatedly. I expect, to a certain extent, that the hopes of gentlemen advocating irrigation will be realized, and I certainly hope so. I am in full sympathy with them, and voted for their bill.

But I propose to follow along a little further to see how much of this Territory ever will come under irrigation and what part that plays as a factor and element in the building up of that Territory as a State.

When interrupted, I was giving the improved farm area in New Mexico as 326,873 acres, showing that the per cent of farm land improved was 6.4 and the amount of irrigated land was 203,893 acres.

Mr. STEWART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. STEWART. I will call his attention to the fact that 1 acre of irrigated land is certainly equal to 2, and it is generally estimated that it is equal to 5 where rainfall is depended on, because you get the maximum crop each year and a much larger crop from irrigated land than from land dependent upon rain.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think that fact appears in the report of the committee, or something similar to it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, Mr. President: it appears from the testimony that one acre of irrigated land will do just this: When it is at its best and when it has plenty of water it will produce from six and possibly sometimes eight cuttings of alfalfa a year and one crop of grain. As is stated in the report of the committee, irrigated land of course is very productive, the best portion of it, but the excessive production of alfalfa is all.

Mr. HALE. Does its irrigation account for the crowded condition of the population of Nevada?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not know about that.

Mr. STEWART. There is room for the population of Nevada to expand, although it is pretty large already, and it has some broad valleys which are very fine. I think those valleys will far exceed the valleys of Maine.

Mr. HALE. Not in population.

Mr. STEWART. The agricultural land of Nevada is, I think, double the agricultural land of Maine that can be irrigated, and I presume the whole State——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. QUARLES in the chair). Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yielded to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator yielded to me.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to everyone who wants to talk.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was about continuing my remarks on the subject of alfalfa. Of course, as the Senator from Nevada well knows, alfalfa is fodder, which leads to the further remark that the irrigation of these Territories is chiefly an adjunct to stock raising.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Now, Mr. President, taking the improved farm area of New Mexico as it is given in the census reports and comparing it with that of Oklahoma, which, as I said before, has only been open ten or twelve years, we find that Oklahoma has about seventeen times as much as New Mexico.

Mr. CLAY. Seventeen times what?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Of improved farm area; that the little State of Massachusetts has three and a half times as much; that Connecticut has over three times as much, and that Kansas has seventy-six times as much.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know where the Senator gets that information.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have the figures furnished by the Census Office, and that is all I know about it.

Mr. ELKINS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. ELKINS. After the lands of which the Senator speaks are irrigated, how will they compare in fertility with the lands of Vermont?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will show the Senator before I get through.

Mr. ELKINS. I hope you will.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall.

Mr. ELKINS. Then I want the Senator to show how much population Vermont had when she came into the Union.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Vermont had three times more of the percentage of the whole population of the United States than New Mexico has.

Mr. ELKINS. I wish the Senator would state the number.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have that in a table here, which shows that Vermont had at that time 85,425, or 2.2 per cent of the entire population of the United States.

Mr. ELKINS. And New Mexico has over 195,000. What has the percentage feature to do with the question? This is another new theory to longer deny justice to the people living in the Territories. After nearly a century this is the first time this strange doctrine has been put forward to strangle the rights of American citizens, just as good, loyal, and free as those living in the States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the population of the entire country is 76,000,000.

Mr. ELKINS. That does not make any difference, and should cut no figure in disposing of this question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We think it does.

Mr. ELKINS. In the past the rule of admission as to population has been based on the ratio of population that would entitle a State to have a Representative in the other House. That has been the rule. This new rule, brought forth by the committee, was never heard of, never thought of, never dreamed of until now. Then, again, Mr. President, how is it possible for a Senate committee to gain accurate information about a Territory, its people, customs, habits, and manners, as well as resources and wealth, by a hurried visit of four days, and ask that their statements be taken as true against the statements of people who are well informed and have lived a lifetime in the Territories?

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to make an inquiry, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. Suppose you apply that rule of percentage to representation in the House of Representatives, what percentage does a present member of the House have to the whole population of the United States compared to what it was a hundred years ago? The percentage, I think, of a member entitled to a seat would be very much less now than it was a hundred years ago, as population has so increased. That is not a fair proposition. The question is, How many people are there in a Territory? The highest percentage ever adopted heretofore in discussions of this kind was based on how many would be a sufficient number to allow representation in the other House. It has been contended that a Territory ought to have a sufficient number for a Representative in the other House of Congress, but it was never stated anywhere in any debate that the population of a Territory asking for admission should bear a certain proportion to the entire population. The different States now bear a smaller ratio to the entire population, as the population has very largely increased, and this would be an unfair comparison.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I am very glad that our friends on the other side have become interested in this question and think it worthy of discussion.

Now, I want to call attention to another table which has been furnished me by the Census Office, which gives the value of live stock and the value of farm products in several of the States and Territories. From it it appears that the value of the farm products of New Mexico was $10,155,215. In reply to the question of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] I will inform him that during the same year the farm products of Vermont were $33,570,892, or three times as great in value as those of New Mexico.

Mr. ELKINS. Yes; but how long has Vermont been a State in the Union?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. She was the first State admitted into the Union, and is one of the smallest of the States.

Mr. ELKINS. I am sorry to see a small State opposing large States coming into the Union.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We are talking about States that have the elements of statehood in them, and the question is whether New Mexico has the elements of statehood in her in respect of agriculture.

Mr. ELKINS. I will answer as to that, that New Mexico has every element of statehood. She has the requisite population necessary to sustain a State government. She has nearly $250,000,000 of property. Her agricultural property is twice that of Vermont. The people there are sturdy, law-abiding, and religious, and a large majority to-day are Americans and speak the English language. In every village there is a church, and the Mexicans in the main are devout Catholics and good citizens.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. We shall see about that.

Mr. ELKINS. And in a solemn treaty we pledged the faith of the United States to admit New Mexico to statehood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. When?

Mr. ELKINS. Under the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. When?

Mr. ELKINS. When our Congress was wise enough to admit them——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is it.

Mr. ELKINS. And surely before all the people to whom the promise was made should die.

Mr. President, I am very sorry that Congress has delayed so long in fulfilling treaty obligations. It was the spirit of the treaty that the people of New Mexico should be admitted to statehood within a reasonable time. The people of New Mexico are as loyal to the Government as are those of Vermont or any State in the Union. They raised three regiments in 1860 to defend the Union, and they raised another regiment in the Spanish war. Nothing can be urged against these people except that some of them do not speak the English language, although many of them are learning it. They are Christians. In every village there is a Catholic church. It is true that they are Southern, but locality should not be brought in to keep a people out who have the right to statehood because they are located in the South. There is no substantial argument against the statehood of New Mexico. It is twenty-seven years since a bill passed the Senate and passed the other House by a two-thirds vote for the admission of New Mexico.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then you impeach every Congress since?

Mr. ELKINS. No; I do not.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I was discussing the agricultural conditions in New Mexico. I am willing to yield to my friend to make a speech, but I will get to that later on. I intend to be entirely fair about this matter. I do not intend to draw any unwarranted conclusions. I want to present to the Senate the exact facts as they have been disclosed to the committee, not only in respect to population, but in respect to agriculture and as to herding and mining, what it all combined amounts to, and what New Mexico as a Territory is. I wish to be entirely fair. I am perfectly willing to be interrupted, because if I am in error about anything, I certainly want to be corrected; but we have been running away from the subject.

By this table, as I was saying, the farm products, by the last census, in New Mexico were valued at $10,155,215, while by the same census those in the Indian Territory were nearly three times as great as that, and in Oklahoma proper nearly four and a half times as great as that. The farm products of Indian Territory and Oklahoma combined were valued at more than seven times as much as they were in New Mexico.

Now, making the comparison with certain others of the States, let us take Illinois. The value of the farm products of Illinois is thirty-four times as great as those of New Mexico, and Illinois is much less in area. In making this comparison I am not forgetful that I am leaving out the other great elements of statehood in Illinois—her magnificent cities, her vast products in manufactures, her commanding position in trade and in commerce—but I am taking the purely agricultural products, and, if I am not mistaken in my figures, they are thirty-four times as great as those of New Mexico.

Let me refer to some of the newer States. Take Minnesota, the farm products of which are sixteen times as great as those of New Mexico; those of North Dakota, six times as great; of South Dakota, six times as great; of Kansas, twenty times as great, and even of Massachusetts, whose farm products that year were valued at $42,000,000, or over four times as much as those of New Mexico, and they do not count farming their chief industry in Massachusetts.

Mr. GALLINGER. Nor do they in New Mexico.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Nor do they in New Mexico?

Were it not for modesty, I should again refer to the fact that the value of Vermont's farm products was three times as great as those of New Mexico.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont—Vermont being a State in the Union—if it would not be just as fair to compare the agricultural products of Illinois with those of Vermont as to compare the agricultural products of Illinois with those of New Mexico?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator from Colorado wishes to be entirely fair, but while in New Mexico they have a great area, I am trying to show you that in that great area they can never depend upon agriculture as a basis of development into a great State.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator does not do that by showing that they have not reached that point. If he will deal with the capabilities of the soil and climate, which we shall be quite ready to meet, I will show that in a single county in one of these great Territories they can beat the entire product of Vermont.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, if I can be convinced of that fact, I shall not be the least bit sorry.

I have another table furnished by the Census Office, that gives the total land surveys throughout the arid regions, the irrigated areas, the per cent of the total acreage irrigated, and the value of the irrigated crops. From this it appears that the per cent of total acreage irrigated in New Mexico is three-tenths of 1 per cent of the whole, and that the value of the irrigated crops was only $2,757,107. The whole farm product was over $10,000,000; but of the irrigated crop it was less than $3,000,000. It is not nearly as great as it is in certain other sections of that area.

What is the future in respect of irrigation in that Territory? That is a very pertinent question; it is one which has been suggested by my friend the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. In answer to that, I beg to present to the Senate—and I call the attention of the Senate to it—testimony of Professor Newell, which will be found in the printed volume, I think on page 321, but I am not certain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will state to the Senator it begins on page 175.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Senator PATTERSON inquired of Professor Newell:

Senator PATTERSON. With the construction of storage reservoirs you can hardly tell the extent, can you, to which the Territory can be irrigated?

Mr. NEWELL. It is impossible at present to tell. The storage will doubtless increase the irrigated area.

Senator PATTERSON. Tremendous volumes of water come down those rivers during certain seasons of the year, do they not?

Mr. NEWELL. They are very large.

Senator PATTERSON. If the waters could be conserved a very heavy percentage of land could be put under irrigation, could it not?

Mr. NEWELL. We have been measuring the amount of water, and if it could all be saved several hundred thousand acres could be irrigated.

Senator PATTERSON. Is that the limit—several hundred thousand?

Mr. NEWELL. I think so. The limit is the total amount of water which comes down the Rio Grande and Pecos. The measurements at various points on the Rio Grande give the actual amount of water which has passed that point during various years in succession. Those figures I can insert in the testimony if you wish. I do not recall them.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. Please do so.

The figures referred to are as follows:

Mr. STEWART. I should like to inquire of the Senator right there if those rivers furnish the only water for irrigation?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They furnish it very largely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What rivers are those?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Rio Grande and the Pecos.

Mr. STEWART. I call attention to the fact that India has millions of acres of land and a hundred million people or more living upon it where there are no rivers, where they store the waters by dams and catch-basins for the purpose of irrigation, and the people in some of those regions are very prosperous. Water for irrigation is obtained by those means and no other. Some of those districts are densely populated. If you have a small ravine and a small stream the water supply can be augmented immensely.

Let me give an example in Utah. As you go north from Ogden, Brigham City and those other cities are large and prosperous. I was along there before the cities were built. The streams that came out from the mountains were mere rivulets. Some of them would not irrigate 50 acres of land, where now they irrigate thousands of acres. By conserving the waters they have brought under cultivation, I should say, hundreds of thousands of acres of land. It is not fair to measure the size of a river and say what can be done in an arid country. If you will examine the question you will understand the truth of my assertion. I do not want to see that Territory given a black eye by such a process as this, which will keep people from settling in it. It is a better Territory than is generally supposed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator, before he sits down, state what the rainfall is in the catch-basin district of India?

Mr. STEWART. I do not know.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In the catch-basin district, as I understand it, that is the impounding of rainfall by reservoirs, the system is different entirely from the impounding of flood waters. That depends upon rainfall, and, therefore, there must be some rainfall.

Mr. STEWART. There is rainfall.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The supply must necessarily be taken into consideration.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will say, in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], that it was the universal testimony of those appearing before the committee that when you get away from rivers there is substantially no such thing as agriculture in New Mexico, but that the Territory is entirely given up to the herding of cattle, and that cattle could only be maintained in the Territory by giving to each cow from 10 to 30 acres, and this must be within 5 miles of a water hole or other supply of water on either side, that distance being a day's journey for cattle.

Mr. STEWART. I remember very well when the San Joaquin Valley was in that same condition; when it was given up entirely to the herding of cattle, on the ground that there was no possibility of the land being cultivated. Where the city of Fresno now is was a desert. But when they put water on it they found they could convert that great valley into a garden. So an undeveloped country ought not to be underrated.

New Mexico has got a good deal in the way of resources. I do not say it is one of the best Territories in the United States; but it is a very good Territory and has many resources. There is a great deal of opportunity there for agriculture and a great deal of water that can be utilized. As to Arizona, it is still better. There is a vast region that can be irrigated. It was once a country of dense population. I feel called upon to defend that Territory when you attack it in the way it has been attacked, because it is not a useless Territory.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator will excuse me. I do not want the Senator from Nevada to think that I am black-eyeing that country. I am reciting the testimony bearing upon its future, and I had not reached my conclusion. I propose to show what the testimony of Professor Newell indicates in that matter. I am very glad to be interrupted; but I do not want to be put in a false position, which the Senator, of course, did not intend.

Mr. STEWART. We are likely to underrate a country. I recollect that General Sherman, who had been all over that country, came before the Committee on Railroads and in perfectly good faith said: "We had better give that whole country back to Mexico; the whole country is simply valueless," and now we have great States there. So Senators ought not to underrate a country without understanding all the conditions. It is a better country than it is even now supposed to be.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have been very much interested in the remarks of the Senator, but when he interrupted me I was about to say what I have said in the colloquy, that the testimony of people who live on the ground taken before the committee was to the general effect that when you got away from the river valleys agriculture was hopeless. The testimony given by Professor Newell has been quoted, and it is not necessary for me to repeat his figures.

In addition to that, he has informed me that 2½ acre-feet of water, as he expresses it, is required to irrigate 1 acre of land, and that if the water of the Rio Grande is impounded it will irrigate 400,000 acres of land. At the present time there are 203,000 acres of land irrigated. I want the Senator to understand me. If that water is impounded it will double that area, and the problem as to how it shall be impounded is very fully gone into by Professor Newell. Anybody interested in the matter will find it in his testimony.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, just one word, if the Senator will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice that Professor Newell, on page 182, in reply to a question from Senator PATTERSON, says that if the waters could be conserved several hundred thousand acres could be irrigated.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have just read that.

Mr. GALLINGER. I understood the Senator to say 400,000 acres.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I just read that. The Senator asked him? "Is that all you would say?" and he said "Yes, several hundred thousand;" and now he goes on further to give the results of the impounding of that water, and says that if you take 2½ acre-feet of water for an acre of land the impounded water would irrigate 400,000 acres.

Mr. GALLINGER. I did not observe that.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Going further, Senator PATTERSON inquired:

Senator PATTERSON. Do I understand you to say that there is no water in the Rio Grande during the summer months through its entire extent from north to south?

Mr. NEWELL. There is usually water throughout the year down to the White Rock Canyon above Albuquerque, but below that, where the Santa Fe road approaches the river, it is entirely dry in summer.

Senator PATTERSON. Albuquerque is how far south of the northern boundary?

Mr. NEWELL. It is nearly midway of the distance of the Territory.

Senator PATTERSON. And the Territory is about how long from north to south?

Mr. NEWELL. I have forgotten the figures.

Senator PATTERSON. About 250 or 300 miles?

Mr. NEWELL. It is nearer 400, I should judge.

The committee, when they crossed that river in going over into old Mexico at El Paso, found the children of the town playing in the bed of the river and building up sand piles.

Mr. TELLER. Where was that?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. At El Paso.

Mr. TELLER. May I interrupt the Senator long enough to state a historical fact?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be very glad to have the Senator interrupt me.

Mr. TELLER. I believe that one of the United States judges has declared that the Rio Grande is a navigable stream. I myself have been to El Paso when the children could have played in the river without wetting their shoes, and I think that is frequently the case, but it is still down on the map as navigable water, and the Territory of New Mexico is not allowed to build a dam across it. If there was ever a farce and a fraud on the public that is one.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I think this must have been the river that was referred to——

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I was merely about to ask for information whether it was not the case, having heard that it was the case, that the disappearance of the water of the Rio Grande at El Paso was occasioned by a sinking away in the sand, which is frequently the case in those arid countries? The rivers there frequently sink into the sand and disappear, and come up at a point below the place of disappearance. I have been told that rock bottom can be reached in the bed of the river at El Paso within a distance of 5 or 6 feet of the surface, and that plenty of water can be found there at any time.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have no information on that point.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that as to that particular point upon the Rio Grande River where the water disappears I do not claim to have any personal knowledge. Of the Arkansas River, which is one of the Colorado rivers, as is the Rio Grande, I know something of its early history.

Before there was an acre of land cultivated in the State of Colorado, at a certain point on the river the river disappeared and reappeared many miles below. That was true when the first immigration went up the river. It is said by the people living below that it is because we use the water. Probably it has always been the case on that river.

On the Platte River, which is a parallel river or something like it, starting in the same general region of country, up and down which I have traveled for forty-odd years, when I did not go down the Arkansas River to get to the East, we found the same thing. What I have said of the Arkansas I can say of the Platte. Before an ounce of water was taken out for domestic purposes of any kind in what is now the State of Colorado the Platte River sank and remained under ground for miles, reappearing again below. The fact is that great sand bars are found there, and the water goes down and strikes bed rock, and when the bed rock rises, as it does below, the water comes out again. That also occurs in some small creeks of the State. We understand that very well. I do not mean to say that that disappearance is accounted for in the way I have stated, but I assume it is, for every time I have seen the Rio Grande River it had some water running in it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I do not think it is worth while for me to follow that discussion any further, as I have no knowledge upon it. Testimony was taken by the committee, but that claim was not made to the committee by anyone, as I now remember.

Before passing from that question, I desire to say that unless the evidence of Professor Newell, upon which we relied, is entirely at fault, it does not appear to me, as an individual, nor did it appear to the committee, that the irrigated areas of New Mexico could ever be great in the sense of making the agriculture of New Mexico a basis for a population which would entitle it to statehood.

But before leaving that question, I ought to refer to another industry, that of stock raising. The report of the committee says in regard to that:

The second industry and first in point of importance is herding and stock raising. For cattle this is successful for a space of 5 miles on either side of a stream, or on what are called "water holes," in the foothills. (Testimony of Martinez Amador, p. 105; F. H. Newell, p. 176, 185; Governor Brodie, p. 155, and others.)

The capacity of the Territory for stock raising can therefore be determined with comparative accuracy. For horses a still wider range is possible, while sheep thrive where neither horses nor cattle can prosper. But when sheep are introduced into a region it seriously interferes with the grazing of cattle, for the reason that the sheep closely crop all edible herbage, leaving nothing for the cattle to subsist upon.

The extent and value of the agriculture and live stock of New Mexico at present are shown by the following table, prepared by the Statistician of the Agricultural Department.

The table appears in the report.

If Senators will turn to the volume of testimony they will find a map of New Mexico, and Professor Newell testifies that the black area on that map includes practically all the land of the Territory which is irrigable; that the white area is good only for the herbage, and that it will support perhaps a cow to 10, 20, or 30 acres, if it is situated within 5 miles of water; and from Mr. Newell's testimony all can see at a glance what the agriculture of New Mexico can probably amount to in the future.

Another industry of New Mexico is mining, and I have brought together the statistics of the production of gold and silver in the year 1901. The entire production of gold and silver of New Mexico during that year in value was $1,026,440. It does not in any way compare with California or Colorado or Montana. In their production they are far in excess of New Mexico, and the littleness of the product is shown when I state the fact that of silver Colorado produced nearly 33 times, I think, as much as New Mexico, and Montana some 23 or 24 times as much as New Mexico, while of gold California produced 24 times as much, Colorado 40 times as much, and Montana 6 or 7 times as much. But taking it as it appears and adding the sum of it to the production of copper, which in that year was $1,540,781, and adding to the value of the gold, silver, and copper the entire farm products of the Territory for that year, which amount to $10,155,215, and adding to that the product of coal for that year, $1,546,652, you have a grand total from all those sources of $14,269,088.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to make a suggestion? He will see it is eminently fair. A considerable quantity of the mineral mined in New Mexico goes to Colorado for reduction or to Kansas City or to El Paso. So a statement of the amount New Mexico produces would not be an accurate statement unless he had also the report as to the shipments to those three points.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am very glad the Senator has stated that fact. Does he know what the proportion is?

Mr. TELLER. I can not tell; I do not know anything about the amount, but I know we get considerable from New Mexico, and I know that some goes to Kansas City, and I know also that some goes to El Paso.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator will find that that total includes all produced in New Mexico, whether reduced there or elsewhere.

Mr. TELLER. Possibly it does. I do not know how that statement is made up.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are no reducing establishments in New Mexico, are there?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know as to that. I have the figures as they appear in the Government reports.

For the purpose of comparison I brought these figures together. In round numbers they are $14,000,000. Now, the farm products of Illinois, which I have referred to before, were twenty-four times as great as that sum, which represents not only the farm products of New Mexico, but also the entire mineral products of New Mexico in the same year. Kansas farm products were eleven times as great; North Dakota almost five times as great, and even Massachusetts' farm products were almost three times as great as the entire product of the farm and mines in New Mexico in the same year. Now, if that be true, where is the material prosperity of New Mexico which would warrant us at this time in admitting her as a State?

There are two classes of inhabitants in New Mexico. In that section of country they are referred to as Mexican and American, and everybody understands, so the testimony shows, that "American" includes substantially all who are not of Mexican descent, while the Mexican represents the old element that was in the Territory when she was acquired by the United States and which has come there since from Mexico, and their descendants. The report says:

> As to the remaining, or "Americans," some of them are not as good citizens as the Mexican element. (Testimony of Judge Mills.) Such are the "riffraff," to use the expression of United States Judge Mills (testimony, p. 1), who first follow the introduction of railroads, and certain other elements always seen on any country's extending frontier, but these are, of course, disappearing. The majority of "Americans," however, are good material for citizenship, and of a large number of them absolutely too much can not be said.
> In the "American" town of East Las Vegas, and in the "American" town of Albuquerque, there are men and women of culture, refinement, ability, energy, and all the best qualities of human character, unexcelled by the most favored section, either in country or city, of this or any other land. This is true of the "American" element of Sante Fe, of the little town of Carlsbad (population from 800 to 1,000), of the flourishing town of Roswell (population 2,500), both on the Pecos River, and, as the committee are informed, of Alamogordo and Deming, and perhaps one or two other points.

I have read this from the report of the committee because it is so well stated; and I want to add to it that in visiting the cities there named and meeting the people of the American towns I was impressed by their intelligence, education, culture, and business ability and the general air of prosperity that surrounded them. We met them at a reception—a reception given that we might have an opportunity to come in contact with the people. We met the gentlemen at a dinner, at which several of them were called upon to speak to us on different phases of statehood. Too much can not be said in favor of the American element that has gone into that Territory and is found in those five or six so-called American towns.

Senators will understand that in Las Vegas you find two towns. As one man expressed it, perhaps in relation to Lascruces, there Old Jerusalem meets with the United States. It is substantially so at Las Vegas. At Las Vegas on one side of the river you find a purely Mexican town, with its adobe buildings. Every business place has its sign in the Spanish language. I do not think I saw one in English. We met some of the school-teachers there. We undertook to converse with the children in the streets, but they were Mexicans and spoke the Spanish language.

Coming back across the river into the other part of town we came into what I have just described, one of the most beautiful of American towns and one of the most attractive. If all the towns and all the population of New Mexico were of the character we found in those towns, it would be an ideal Territory as to population, because nothing can be said in praise of them more than they deserve.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to interrupt the Senator long enough to ask him what about the Spanish population.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I will come to them.

Mr. TELLER. I was afraid the Senator would overlook them.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; I intend to take them up.

Now, if the future of this Territory is not full of promise and of immediate growth and expansion and development, it did not seem to the committee that it was entitled to admission as a State at this time; that delay would be no hardship to her, while the admission of the Territory as a State until she is ready, and particularly if the fear expressed by some that she never would be great is to be realized, would be not simply a hardship, but a wrong to the nation. The admission of a State is something in the nature of a contract, and a State ought not to be admitted into the Union until she has either reached a point where she is entitled to it or unless the promise of development within a reasonable time in the future will warrant it. A mistake made by Congress in keeping out a Territory is one that can be remedied. A mistake made by Congress in admitting a State that ought not to be admitted is one that never can be corrected. The act of admission stands forever. It is a thing of the ages.

Now, there are other reasons why I think that this Territory is not prepared for admission at the present time. I have referred already to the American element, and I will refer now to the Mexican population. I do not know of any exact statistics showing the number of each class. I think Delegate RODEY submitted his estimate that two-fifths of the population were Mexican, while ex-Mayor Marron, of Albuquerque, in his testimony stated unhesitatingly that 60 per cent of the entire population of the Territory was Mexican. The census reports do not divide them, so that we have no authoritative statement, but the testimony of the census enumerators who came before us, the testimony of the judges, and others showed that substantially the whole of the American population was contained in the towns and that the great country regions throughout that Territory were occupied mainly by the Mexican population, a large proportion of whom are herders of flocks—goats, sheep, and some cattle.

Now, the sizable towns in that Territory, a fact to which I have already called the attention of the Senate, are few in number. You can substantially count them upon the fingers of your hands. There are only five or six, according to the census, that had over 2,500 inhabitants in 1900. They are fine towns and growing towns, undoubtedly. For the purpose of ascertaining the status of the Mexican population, their character and their habits, we called before us the justices of the peace in every town where we stopped. An examination of the testimony given by them as it is reported will show you to what a large extent they were Mexicans and to what a large extent the Spanish language is used in that Territory. They were almost all Mexicans.

The office is elective; the records which they brought in for our examination were kept almost exclusively in the Spanish language. Every one of them, I think, testified that the proceedings in his court required the services of an interpreter. Deeds are largely written in the Spanish language. Some were in English. The justices testified that the code of procedure which they had in their office was printed in Spanish. We observed that the legal notices posted about the cities were printed both in the English and the Spanish language. In the Federal and Territorial courts the interpreter is just as much an officer and just as regular in attendance as the stenographer or the clerk.

Mr. CULLOM. Are they Spaniards?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. As a rule they are Spaniards or educated Mexicans. The testimony shows that they interpret the testimony of witnesses, because the juries are mixed juries. In reply to the inquiry of the Senator from Colorado I will state that it was the universal testimony of the judges that the Mexicans on those juries were very acceptable men; that they were modest and unassuming; that they heeded the instructions of the court, and, as one of the judges expressed it, that there were no "Smart Alecks" among them. I am glad to say that in behalf of them. But a large number of them are illiterate, signing by crosses when they receipt for their pay.

Except in two or three counties, the services of an interpreter are in constant demand.

He interprets the testimony to the jury. If the witness is a Spaniard, he interprets it to the American jurors, and if the witness is an American he interprets it in Spanish to the Mexican jurors. When the counsel is ready to argue his case, the interpreter stands by his side, talking as fast as the counsel, interpreting his argument to the jury. When the judge is ready to charge the jury, the interpreter performs the same office for him; and there are cases referred to in evidence where the court was compelled to send the interpreter into the jury room because there was not on the jury an American who could speak Spanish nor a Mexican who could speak English. More frequently, and in the larger number of cases, there is on the jury an Americen who can speak Spanish or a Mexican who can speak English, so that an interpreter is not required in the jury room.

This matter of interpretation is a serious one there. It appears that in the political conventions of the Territory it is absolutely necessary to have an interpreter, and it appears from the testimony of Marshal Foraker that in the last Territorial convention, which nominated the present Delegate in Congress, they required the services of an interpreter, and the substitute interpreter testified before us that the regular interpreter becoming tired, he took his place in that convention.

Further than that, it appears that they require an interpreter in their Territorial legislature, which is made up partly of the Mexican and partly of the American element. The ballots at their elections are printed both in Spanish and in English. It was in evidence that at a majority of the political meetings held outside of the towns the speeches made in English had to be interpreted into Spanish. That is the extent to which the Spanish language is used in that Territory. Whether that be for or against her in considering the question involved in this discussion is for the Senate to determine.

New Mexico has made a fair start educationally. It has admirable schools in Albuquerque, in the American town. It has admirable schools in New Lasvegas, also on the other side, in the Mexican section, but they have altogether a different class of pupils in there. The university at Albuquerque is entitled to a great deal of credit. There are now about a hundred pupils, most of them being local, a few coming long distances. This institution has a good corps of officers and is well equipped generally. But it will be a long time, in my opinion, before the Mexican population, as a whole, the masses of which the testimony shows are without marked ambition or business energy, are educated through the English schools and brought so in touch with the American population and American thought as to make them live, aggressive, representative American citizens.

In the public schools, outside of Las Vegas and some other American towns, Spanish and English are both taught. The superintendent of education for the Territory testified before us that in the common schools in the Territory language, grammar, geography, and arithmetic were taught, and that Spanish is taught exclusively in some districts from "paucity of teachers."

It appears that the schools when they were first opened were pretty largely taught by ladies who had gone from the North on account of lung difficulties, but now, under a law of the Territory, diseased persons are not permitted to teach. It is therefore difficult to secure a sufficient number of teachers, and, as a consequence, only Spanish is taught in some districts. The textbooks, which are in Spanish, are Valazquez's Grammar and Reader, McDuffey's Arithmetic and Geography translated into Spanish, and McDuffey's American History translated into Spanish.

I think a fair specimen of the schools in the Spanish-speaking territory may be found in old Lasvegas. The pupils are taken through the second Spanish reader. They are almost wholly Mexican. Having completed the second Spanish reader they are carried further along in English. A teacher in that school, Miss Zana, testified that the children of Mexican parents almost invariably, upon leaving that school, spoke Spanish; that they loved it. The superintendent of that school testified that most of the time the children speak Spanish, but some of the time they speak English; that they prefer to speak their mother tongue. At New Lasvegas we had the testimony of Miss Bucher, who is the superintendent of the schools at that place. She was called by Delegate RODEY, I believe.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. She says that in that American town only English is taught. Out of 715 pupils, about 100 of them are Mexicans, and her testimony was to the effect that they could keep this class of pupils up through the fifth grade, but they never entered the high school. It is evident that under these most favorable circumstances the Mexican children, taken as a whole, make slow progress in acquiring the English language, and that they are not apt pupils. Upon being asked regarding their progress before leaving school, Miss Bucher said:

They read in the fifth reader, and have an idea of fractions and language work and geography. They are quite apt in anything mechanical. They learn to write and learn to draw, but it is very hard to teach them English well.

That is her experience with them.

Coming to the question of illiteracy in that Territory, the report states:

The remainder of the 195,310 people in New Mexico are called in that Territory "Americans," as contradistinguished from the class above spoken of, who are there termed "Mexicans." But the "Americans" are made up from every other nationality except Mexicans. Germans, Italians, French, and all other nationalities are called "Americans," and yet of the entire population of New Mexico 33.2 per cent are illiterates—that is, that portion can neither read nor write Spanish, English, or any other language. (Census of 1900.)

If the test of illiteracy were confined to the English language only, the committee is of the opinion that the percentage of illiterates should be much more than doubled.

Thirteen thousand six hundred and twenty-five of the population of the Territory are foreign born. Thirty-one thousand six hundred and thirty-nine are of foreign parentage. When you consider that 33 per cent of the whole are unable to read in any language, either Spanish or English, or any other, the Senate must see the difficulty that confronts New Mexico in solving its educational problem. I am glad to say that conditions are improving. Statistics indicate progress in the last ten years. The percentage of illiterates is less now than then, but this progress must of necessity be slow. When you compare the illiteracy of New Mexico with that of the States in that section of the country, the comparison is not to the credit of New Mexico. Take Nevada, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Utah, California, Kansas, Nebraska, and the Dakotas and bring them together, and the average rate of illiteracy is only 5.2 per cent as against 33.2 per cent in New Mexico and 29 per cent in Arizona. Those figures need no comment.

This condition is in marked contrast with that in Oklahoma, a much newer Territory. In thirteen years people have emigrated there in vast numbers, and yet the per cent of illiteracy in that Territory is only 5.5, while in the Indian Territory, without any Territorial government and without any system of schools, the people who have gone in there to swell the population to its present great number are of such a class that the percentage of illiteracy is only 19.

Mr. QUARLES. That includes Indians?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Everybody in the Indian Territory.

The facts I have stated indicate, as is stated in the report, the necessity there was for the committee to take an interpreter along with them if they would examine witnesses of various classes—justices of the peace, census enumerators, and others.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am greatly interested in the discussion, especially in the school question. I have noticed that a Mexican is the superintendent of public schools in the Territory of New Mexico. The census reports show, and I commend it to the attention of the Senator, that from 1880 to 1890 there was a decrease of 7.38 per cent in public school enrollment in the State of Maine; there was a decrease of 8.51 in my own State, I regret to say; a decrease of 10.42 in Vermont; there was a gain of 1.38 in New York, of 1.59 in Pennsylvania, and of 283.07 in the Territory of New Mexico. Those figures have been supplied to me from the census reports, and, if they are correct, they show that while many of those people are still ignorant, they are making marvelous progress in the matter of education.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. And in getting into school.

Mr. GALLINGER. And getting into school.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is true; and I am coming to speak of it more fully.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have examined the advance sheets of the report of the governor for 1902, and I have been astonished to see what beautiful buildings they have for school purposes in some portions of the Territory. It has struck me very forcibly that the present superintendent—and I think he has been long superintendent of public instruction—a Mexican, seems to be a thoroughly qualified man for his position. I think they are doing pretty well, all things considered.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am sorry that the Senator did not give us the figures for the period from 1890 to 1900.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have not them at hand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; Mr. RODEY did not furnish them to me.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. RODEY did not furnish these to me.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator permit me for just a moment?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was struck by the comparison of increase and decrease; but its value as showing the present educational conditions and the progress would be indicated by the fact that if no school existed and one was started with only one child, and then another child attended, there would be an increase of a hundred per cent. So where communities are old, where everybody has gone to school and one child drops out, there would be a decrease. Therefore from the figures the Senator from New Hampshire presents the inference might just as well be drawn, as the one he draws, that they are, as the committee says, getting a start.

Mr. GALLINGER. I drew no conclusions particularly. I stated what seems to be a fact. Now, I would be glad to have the percentage from 1890 to 1900, if the Senator has it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I have not the percentage that I can give, but I know that the percentage of increase in New Mexico is not half during the last ten years what it was during the ten years the Senator referred to. But these figures are explainable. It is that the mass of the people there were not in school, as in New England every child almost was in school.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is it, exactly.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. After the school system was inaugurated there, which I have commended, and I am glad to commend it, they began to get this population into schools in such numbers that it made the immense percentage which the Senator from New Hampshire has referred to. But it is not to be taken as against his own State, nor Vermont, nor any other where for a century the children of those States have been in public schools almost wholly.

Mr. CULLOM. Almost the entire population.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; almost the entire population. I was coming to that question when the Senator interrupted me. The establishment of schools in that Territory is to the credit of the Americans who have gone in there. There appeared before the committee a very bright young man. He had been selected to represent the interests of New Mexico. I refer to Mr. Hughes, editor of the Citizen, of Albuquerque. He said in his testimony:

In 1887 I had the honor of introducing into the legislature the first public school bill. It was beaten, but the next session it was passed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The date was 1889, was it not?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. He said he introduced it in 1887.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the next session was 1889?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes, sir; the year that you have mentioned.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question? Do I understand him to read from testimony showing that no public schools were established by law in New Mexico before 1889?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. That is the testimony of Mr. Hughes. He said that in 1887 he "had the honor of introducing into the legislature the first public school bill. It was beaten, but the next session it was passed."

He goes on, then, to discuss the nature and character of the Mexican population. He says:

I was in the Pomeroy campaign in Kansas, and I know what political corruption is. I have been a member of the legislature since 1887. I never knew a member to receive money for anything. If a native of this Territory likes you, and if they have confidence in you, you can get almost everything with them, and I will say this about them in politics, that in my twenty-two years' experience I have never had one of them to lie to me in politics. If the leaders say in a precinct here that it is going to come out so and so, it is going to come out that way. I have been the chairman of this committee here for years, and I never paid a Mexican a cent for his vote in this Territory.

Then he goes on to describe them:

They are a quiet, peaceable people. You must remember that up to 1865 the peons of this Territory, which was possibly two-thirds of the population, were practically slaves. Lincoln's emancipation proclamation emancipated them. We have two or three hundred of them here working in the railroad shops. They are faithful workers. Forty or fifty of them are working in the woolen mills. They are not energetic. They do not care about getting rich like Americans. They are perfectly willing to let things go easy. They never suggest anything in the legislative assembly; they are perfectly willing to let anything go through. If you get a bill through and the next session you want to amend it, they say nothing, but go ahead and vote for the amendment.

That is the testimony as to the character of the Mexican population as a whole, and as they appear in the legislature, which was given by Mr. Hughes, one of the men selected to present the claims of New Mexico for statehood.

The future of this Mexican element, as it appears to the committee, is described in the report as follows:

THE FUTURE OF THE "MEXICAN" ELEMENT.

Nothing is said against the patriotism or the native intelligence of the great mass of people who constitute the so-called "Mexican" population of New Mexico. They have many excellent qualities. The "Mexican" class as a body have also many characteristics not familiar to the mass of the American people, and, to the hypercritical, not perhaps admirable, though this is a question of point of view. There are of course among them men and women of high education, culture, and all the best qualities of good citizenship.

On the whole, the committee feel that in the course of time, when education, now only practically beginning, shall have accomplished its work; when the mass of the people, or even a majority of them, shall in the usages and employment of their daily life have become identical in language and customs with the great body of the American people; when the immigration of English-speaking people who have been citizens of other States does its modifying work with the "Mexican" element—when all these things have come to pass, the committee hopes and believes that this mass of people, unlike us in race, language, and social customs, will finally come to form a creditable portion of American citizenship. And when that time arrives no one, least of all the members of the committee who have studied the situation on the ground, will object to statehood for this people so far as this particular consideration is concerned.

But I think that the real conditions existing in the Mexican people in New Mexico was better expressed by one of their own number who appeared before us voluntarily at Lascruces, asking the privilege of making a statement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Martinez Amador?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Martinez Amador. He was 64 years of age, a fine-looking man, polite, bright, well nourished, with a strong face, evidently a man of substance and of character. He spoke English brokenly, and before he completed his remarks the interpreter was called to assist him, although he made himself fairly well understood. The following question was asked him:

Is there any statement which you want to make to the committee?

The answer was:

Well, I want, if you will allow me, to make a statement about our population. My people all belong to the Mexican race. They come from old Mexico, and I think our people is not able now to support statehood, because most of the people here is ignorant; and I do not think we are ready to support statehood yet for about ten years, until our children grow up. We got good schools now, and we send our children to school, and they doing well; but the old residents are mostly Mexicans, you know. You take them in the election time, and you take them what you call the emblem; they go by that, and they do not know who they vote for. They do not know who is on the ticket—the majority of that kind of people.

As a consequence, I think there is one great fault of our people—they have not got education, the old timers; the old timers, like me. I never been in the schools, except the primary schools, you know; but I been picking up here and there to know just the little I know now, and that is about all; but I never been in the schools. My children are all well educated. They have been to school in St. Louis and they have been in the schools here. My children, they are able to support statehood and compete with the majority as far as people, you know; but the others, I am very sorry to say it, they are not able to do that.

The remainder of the questions propounded to the witness, and the answers thereto, were made through the medium of the official interpreter of the committee.

Q. What is the feeling of the people, the native Mexicans out in the country, like yourself, about this subject?

A. There are a good many that do not know what statehood is. They do not know the difference between a State and a Territory. The greater part of them do not know how to write or read.

Q. You live out in the country. Now, in the campaigns are there speeches made out there to your people?

A. Yes; they have some speeches, but it is always in Spanish when they have campaign speeches. Sometimes they speak in English, and then they have an interpreter to interpret it to them.

I think that the status of the old population in that Territory is accurately portrayed by Mr. Amador, who, as before stated, came before the committee upon his own motion. He impressed, I think, every member of the committee as being sincere, honest, and intelligent, and as having, perhaps, a better knowledge of the condition of the Mexican element than any other witness who appeared before us.

I have about completed what I have to say of New Mexico. I think the committee is right in its conclusions that the population of that Territory is not now sufficient in number for statehood; nor is the prospect of a greatly increased population in the near future sufficiently promising to warrant statehood. I am persuaded that the committee is also correct in its judgment that the population, taken as a whole, has not made that advance in education which should be desired.

The situation as it relates to a large element of the Mexican population is substantially that described by Mr. Amador. When their children shall have grown up and shall have received the benefits derived from attendance upon the public schools now established and in the higher institutions of learning, as Mr. Amador's children have done, a population will exist from which there will come into the legislature men unlike those described by Mr. Hughes, who will be able to suggest things in legislation, who will not be willing to let everything go through, and who will not be willing to do everything they are asked to do by the leaders of either one or the other political parties.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I understand the Senator has something more to say, and if it is agreeable to him I will move an executive session.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Vermont will proceed to-morrow?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I should like to go on to-morrow. I have not concluded my remarks.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seventeen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 7 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, December 16, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

RECIPROCITY TREATIES.

The injunction of secrecy was removed this day from the report of the subcommittee on Foreign Relations, submitted by Mr. CULLOM on the question as to whether the Senate has jurisdiction to act upon the reciprocity treaties transmitted to the Senate and now pending in that body.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, December 15, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Rev. HENRY BEETS, pastor of the Lagrave Street Christian Reformed Church, of Grand Rapids, Mich., offered the following prayer:

Gracious God, who art in heaven, we bless Thy holy name for the rest and privileges of the Sabbath of yesterday. We bless Thee for all of Thy gifts unto us as individuals, as families, and as a nation. Forgive us graciously that we do not sufficiently appreciate Thy blessings toward us.

Forgive us all of our sins of omission and of commission.

And, as we are assembled here at this moment, we ask of Thee that Thou vouchsafe to us Thy blessing in every way.

Let Thy favor be extended unto this House of Representatives, unto every one of its members, and especially unto the Speaker. Let Thy blessing also be showered upon our Senate and our Acting Vice-President, and let our Congress be blessed with Thy gifts of light and wisdom and righteousness, that all of its deliberations and resolutions may be a blessing to our commonwealth.

We ask of Thee in a special manner to remember the respected and honored head of our nation, our President, Theodore Roosevelt. Wilt Thou bless him, O God, in body, in mind, and in spirit, that he may be a blessing to our land, and, if possible, to all mankind? We ask of Thee to remember in Thy favor his Cabinet, and our Army and our Navy, and everything pertaining to the executive branch of our Government.

Let Thy favor rest upon our Supreme Court and upon our lower courts, that our laws may be administered in keeping with Thy divine principles of justice and of love.

Remember all of our States and Territories and those that are in authority, as well as all people under them. Wilt Thou cause our prosperity to continue. Let peace and righteousness prevail.

And wilt Thou even use us as an instrument, O God, if possible, that Thy Kingdom may come by means of our national activities.

Wilt Thou hear us and accept of us and be gracious unto us and all of our interests. We ask it of Thee, Father of Mercies, for the sake of Jesus, Thy Son, and through the Holy Spirit. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, December 13, was read and approved.

COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs the attention of the House to the following statement and request:

In assigning the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. FLANAGAN] to the Committee on Claims, the Chair inadvertently increased the number one more than the number allowed by the rule. If there is no objection, this increase will be sanctioned for the remainder of the session.

There was no objection.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, at the request of many members, I ask unanimous consent, before the District Committee takes up its business, to consider very briefly the urgent deficiency bill that I reported on Saturday, which carries $1,125,000 for items of which I think the House will approve. If the consideration of the bill takes much time, I will withdraw it.

The bill appropriates something over $500,000 for the rural free delivery and other post-office deficiencies, and $500,000 for the Secretary of Agriculture, in connection with the suppression of foot-and-mouth disease.

I ask this for the reason that I am informed, in view of the early adjournment, that unless this bill passes before the holidays it will lead to much of delay touching our rural free-delivery service. I have no desire about it, except to accommodate the House and the public.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman permit me one moment? I will ask him if it is not true that the condition with reference to the rural free-delivery service is this: That there are many routes which have been favorably reported, and that numbers of them can not be put into operation by the 1st of January, or at any time in the near future, as was expected, unless this bill passes? In other words, the deficiency is asked for, as I understand it, in order to put into operation routes that have been surveyed, and that are ready to be put into operation.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is correct about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if the $500,000 he speaks of for the Agricultural Department is intended to be a part of the $1,000,000 called for in the bill that was reported a few days ago by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. CANNON. It is absolutely in lieu of the $1,000,000 asked for. We have had a hearing with the Secretary, which hearing is printed in connection with the report, and we believe that the appropriation we have recommended meets the emergency.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This appropriation is intended to take the place of the $1,000,000 asked for in that bill, as I understand?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will let the Chair state the request. The gentleman from Illinois, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill H. R. 16057, an urgent deficiency bill. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman, in addition to what I have already asked him, if this can in any sense be called a deficiency—$500,000?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly; because this $500,000, by apt words, appropriates money appropriated in the regular Agricultural bill for the current year for the Bureau of Animal Industry and adopts all the language by reference to that page of language that covers the appropriation for that Bureau. But in the hearing we went further, and therefore publish it. By law the Secretary of Agriculture is bound to use the $500,000 for the suppression of communicable diseases of animals. He is not legally bound, but is morally. We did this for the reason that we thought it safer to supplement the appropriation for that Bureau than to have any attempt at legislating on the bill, and this provision in no wise legislates, but simply adds $500,000 to the $1,100,000 appropriated by the regular Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the bill as reported change existing law?

Mr. CANNON. Not in the slightest.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is simply an appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. That is all.

Mr. MADDOX. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. What law is there authorizing this $500,000 appropriation?

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will take the Agricultural appropriation bill he will find that that authorizes it, if anything does.

Mr. MADDOX. As I understand that, the Agricultural bill does not authorize it.

Mr. CANNON. The Agricultural appropriation for this year. This is a supplemental appropriation.

Mr. MADDOX. May I ask you how it was appropriated in that bill?

Mr. CANNON. Under that $1,100,000 appropriation.

Mr. MADDOX. For this particular purpose, or for all purposes in connection with that Bureau?

Mr. CANNON. All included in the $1,100,000.

Mr. MADDOX. But for this purpose?

Mr. CANNON. It was not segregated.

Mr. MADDOX. This foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. CANNON. It was not segregated in the original bill.

Mr. MADDOX. So you call this a deficiency?

Mr. CANNON. I call this an additional appropriation, technically called a deficiency, for the service of the current year in connection with the Bureau of Animal Industry, and supplementing the status without adding any word of legislation.

Mr. MADDOX. It is technically called so, but really not so.

Mr. CANNON. Literally, it is true.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. CANDLER. Recurring to the rural-delivery matter. Will the amount of appropriation specified in this bill put in operation the routes that have been inspected and recommended to be put in operation?

Mr. CANNON. In round numbers, 2,100.

Mr. CANDLER. Will that bring it up to date?

Mr. CANNON. So I am informed.

Mr. CANDLER. And the Department says that this will put them in operation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; for the balance of the fiscal year.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1903, namely:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

BUREAU OF ANIMAL INDUSTRY.

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation "General expenses, Bureau of Animal Industry," including each and every object authorized by law and specified in the appropriation of $1,160,000 under this title in the "act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903," approved June 3, 1902, $500,000.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

PUBLIC LANDS SERVICE.

For furnishing transcripts of records and plats, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $10,000: Provided, That persons employed under this appropriation shall be selected by the Secretary of the Interior at a compensation of $2 per day while actually employed at such times and for such periods as the exigencies of the work may demand.

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

POSTAL SERVICE.

OUT OF THE POSTAL REVENUES.

For pay of letter carriers of rural free-delivery service, $500,000.

For incidental expenses, including letter boxes, furniture, satchels, straps, badges, etc., $25,000.

For rent, light, and fuel for first, second, and third class post-offices, $50,000.

For acting clerks in place of clerks injured while on duty, and to enable the Postmaster-General to pay the sum of $1,000 to the legal representatives of any railway postal clerk who shall be killed while on duty, or who, being injured while on duty, shall die within one year thereafter as a result of such injury, $40,000.

Out of the sum appropriated by the act approved April 21, 1902, under the heading Railway Mail Service, "for rent, light, fuel, telegraph, and miscellaneous office expenses, schedules of mail trains, telephone service, typewriting machines, and badges for railway postal clerks," $950 may be paid for rent of offices for division superintendent of Railway Mail Service in Washington, D. C., from July 1 to August 31, 1902.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. The inquiry I wish to make relates to line 23 on page 2, "for acting clerks in place of clerks injured while on duty." Is that original matter or is it derived from some statute?

Mr. CANNON. I do not know whether there is any statute authorizing it or not, but it supplements an appropriation in the regular Post-Office appropriation bill for the current year. It is not broadened or narrowed. Your committee did not go to the extent of inquiring whether it was authorized by previous legislation or not, but I take it it is the sense of Congress to appropriate for this purpose, because it did appropriate for it in the regular annual bill coming from the Post-Office Committee, and the amount is about exhausted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. As I understand, the amount of $40,000 is appropriated here, and the Postmaster-General is not allowed to give more than a thousand dollars to any railway mail clerk who is killed or dies from injury.

Mr. CANNON. Within one year.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It must be that amount—not less than that or more than that—and the Postmaster-General is compelled to pay it under any circumstances, whether there was negligence or otherwise, provided the man is in the Railway Mail Service at the time?

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend, I do not know. I find this provision in hoc verba in the regular appropriation bill, reported there, enacted into law for the current year, and that the $45,000 that was so appropriated is about exhausted. We took it to be the sense of Congress to pay in such cases, so that we took literally the language that there is in the regular Post-Office appropriation bill, taking nothing therefrom nor adding anything thereto. No doubt the gentleman from California would have fuller knowledge than I have.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am not criticising the paragraph in this bill, but I think it ought to go, and the Government ought to go one step further in the matter, because I have in my mind now notable instances where I think the Government ought to respond where a man loses his life, for instance, in the Department of Justice, as a deputy United States marshal. Why not?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman may be correct in his position, but after all we are not dealing with that particular phase of the question here.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I know we are not, but I wanted to get at the extent of it, so that we may be able to deal with it hereafter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I see that the appropriation is made here of $500,000 for the Agricultural Bureau, and I assume that it is taken as an emergency appropriation to meet the conditions that exist in New England arising out of the foot-and-mouth disease among cattle in several of the Northeastern States.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to the gentleman from Indiana that for the current work of the Bureau of Animal Industry for the present year, in the regular Agricultural appropriation bill which has been enacted into law, there were in round numbers eleven hundred thousand dollars appropriated, under language that it is plain makes that appropriation available for the stamping out of the foot-and-mouth disease or any communicable disease of animals within certain limits.

Mr. MADDOX. What are those limits?

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will send and get the Agricultural appropriation act he will see there is a page of limitations. Now, then, the Secretary of Agriculture, as shown in the hearings which we publish in our report, says that there is an extraordinary emergency of the foot-and-mouth disease in four New England States, and that he has full authority under the law, as he claims, and I see no reason to dispute it, to use that appropriation in stamping out that disease; but he says that that appropriation is required for the current work of the Bureau of Animal Industry, and in the presence of this extraordinary emergency, he requires $500,000, or so much as is necessary, to meet the emergency.

Now, after a full hearing, your committee were satisfied that that was the case, and we recommend to the House the appropriation of $500,000, or so much as is necessary, reenforcing all along the line the $1,100,000 that is in the law, adding nothing to the authority and taking nothing from it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I understand we have a law now authorizing the Bureau of Animal Industry, a law which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to take such means as he deems proper for stamping out contagious diseases among animals, and under that law he has already expended $100,000 in excess of what he had on hand.

Mr. CANNON. No, he has not spent the whole $1,100,000, but the year is only half gone, and he says the $1,100,000 only carries on the current work of that Bureau, and with this extraordinary expenditure it is necessary to have this additional money.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The gentleman misunderstands me. In the hearing in which the Secretary of Agriculture was heard before the Agricultural Committee I understood that he said that he had expended or assumed obligations in excess of what he then had on hand to the amount of nearly $100,000. This is shown by the printed hearings.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman evidently misunderstood him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Under the present law the Secretary of Agriculture has the right and power to stamp out this disease, or any disease such as the foot-and-mouth disease, and no further legislation, I understand, is needed in that line, and this House is now asked to appropriate $500,000 so that he may operate under the law as it now exists.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. There has been some statement that new legislation was necessary, and I want to ask whether this in any way takes away from the State their power to quarantine or abate this disease?

Mr. CANNON. Not in the slightest, unless that power has already been taken away by legislation. We do not deal with legislation, we deal with the status.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think that $500,000 is a large amount to meet the exigency as now presented in the two or three States of the Union?

Mr. CANNON. I think if it sins at all it sins in a little more than enough instead of a little less than enough, but it is made under statements from the Secretary of Agriculture which morally binds him, and it seemed to your committee to be sufficient, and it will only be devoted to this specific purpose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I ask the gentleman whether the Secretary of Agriculture is to use this money, under a moral obligation, for the purpose only of stamping out this particular disease now prevalent in several States of the Union. Is he morally bound, according to the statement of the gentleman, to limit the expenditure of the money to that use?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly. He is morally bound to use this sum of $500,000 for the purpose, not of paying current expenses of that Bureau, but for the purpose of stamping out communicable diseases.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman whether this is to be considered a precedent for exercising Federal authority in other States where they have contagious diseases of animals or of persons, and appropriating large amounts of money either for the maintenance of quarantine or for the purpose of paying for property that has been destroyed in quarantine efforts.

Mr. CANNON. Under this appropriation he can do nothing he can not do to-day or could not have done yesterday. I hope he will consider himself morally bound, if the foot-and-mouth disease or pleuro-pneumonia should break out in the gentleman's State or in mine, to use this money for the purpose of stamping out the disease, as he is using it for that purpose in the New England States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In connection with what has been said I want to say that I have in my pocket a letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, in which he says that he construes this act to give him authority to stamp out any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease in any of the States, if there should be an outbreak.

Mr. CANNON. He so construes, not this bill, but the law as it now is.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Under the law as it now is he, as he says, thinks he now has authority to expend this money for stamping out not only the foot-and-mouth disease, but any other disease.

Mr. CANNON. This appropriation confers no new authority upon him. It merely adopts the law as it is. Whether the law is sufficient or not is a matter for the accounting officers of the Treasury and the Secretary. We do not propose in this deficiency bill to confer any new authority upon him whatever, and we do not do so; we simply adopt the existing status.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We transfer to him certain powers now possessed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SULZER. And those powers ought to be transferred to him.

Mr. MADDOX rose.

Mr. CANNON. I hope we shall not consume a great deal of time on this matter, because I am infringing on the courtesy of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. MADDOX. It is not my purpose to consume time. I objected to this bill the other day——

Mr. CANNON. Not this bill.

Mr. MADDOX. Not this bill, but the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. From what the gentleman from Illinois now says I understand that we are proposing to appropriate $500,000 under a general law that already exists.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely.

Mr. MADDOX. There is a state of facts now existing that I want to present to the House. In my part of the country they are shipping horses and mules time and again that are infected with the glanders or the distemper—both communicable diseases—and which are thus spread all over the country, destroying our stock. Not only diseased horses and mules, but also diseased hogs and sheep are thus shipped. Now, I want to know whether this money may be applied to the stamping out and paying for killing those horses or sheep or hogs as much as it applies to the destruction of these cattle that have the foot-and-mouth disease.

Mr. CANNON. I see no reason why it should not be so. If the law covers one it covers the other.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman understands the matter that way?

Mr. CANNON. Undoubtedly, if the law covers one it covers the other; that is my judgment. Of course, I am not authorized to give a binding construction of the law. This is a power to be exercised under the interstate provision of the law.

Mr. MADDOX. My objection to the bill at that time was that if this provision for stamping out diseases of cattle and paying for diseased cattle were limited to the stamping out of a single disease, such a provision would be unfair and unjust to many of the people of the United States.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will read the provision of the existing law in the Agricultural appropriation bill, which is the law for the current year, he will find that it applies to one as well as to the other.

I now yield to my friend from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], not for a speech, but for a question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman for how long this appropriation of $500,000 is available?

Mr. CANNON. Until it is expended; until and including the 30th day of next June.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it available beyond that?

Mr. CANNON. Not at all, without further legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If on the 10th day of July there should be a further outbreak of this disease in the West or other part of the country, there would be no money available.

Mr. CANNON. In the meantime, I would state, Mr. Speaker, my exceedingly able and zealous friend at the head of the Committee on Agriculture provides for the service of that great Department in the coming year in a general Agricultural appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. And that appropriation bill in all probability will be passed some time in January. The gentleman does not answer my question at all. What I want to know is this: Suppose there is a general outbreak of this disease, and it travels into the great Western herds, and on the 10th day of July Congress is not in session. In the meantime the money is exhausted in exterminating it in New England. Now, what is the Secretary of Agriculture going to do then?

Mr. CANNON. My friend from New York, having provided for it in the provisions of a bill which deals with the service for the coming fiscal year, if the House will follow him, can set aside all the money in the Treasury for that purpose after the 30th of June next. In the meantime, if anything happens between this and the 4th of March to show that a further appropriation is necessary for the remainder of this fiscal year, our Congress is in session; and we are to have a regular deficiency bill between this and the 4th of March, so that there is no danger in the premises.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well. Now, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say one word more.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is simply in defense of the action taken by the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. CANNON. I am not attacking the committee at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know that, but I wish to put the committee right. The Secretary of Agriculture appeared before that committee and asked for a million dollars, to be immediately available; and if the members of the House will turn to the hearings on that subject before the Agricultural Committee they will see that the Secretary asks for a million dollars and wanted it immediately available. I simply mention that fact to show that the Secretary has changed his opinion, and that the Committee on Agriculture were not stampeded or panic-stricken into the idea of asking for a million dollars, but acted on the judgment of the Secretary. That is all I want to say.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, I want to defend the Secretary of Agriculture. The gentleman's committee has jurisdiction of appropriations for the coming fiscal year. For deficiency appropriations to be made immediately available, under the rules, that committee has no jurisdiction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not questioning that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. The committee having jurisdiction examined the Secretary of Agriculture and reports the examination. The Secretary of Agriculture would have been glad to have had a million or two million or three million as a permanent continuing fund, but we do not appropriate that way; and the Secretary of Agriculture, in view of the present condition and the fact that another deficiency bill is to be passed between this and the 4th of March, was quite satisfied that half a million was enough to meet the present emergency.

Mr. BURLESON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and then I shall ask for the previous question.

Mr. BURLESON. If the gentleman can, I would like for him to tell me when this practice of the Federal Government paying for animals affected with communicable or contagious diseases was inaugurated.

Mr. CANNON. I am informed that it began with the establishment of the Bureau of Animal Industry. I can not state it so broadly, but if it did not commence at any other time, it commenced on the 1st day of last July, and that is the status now, and we only deal with the existing status.

Mr. BURLESON. Now, as I understand the gentleman——

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the gentleman will allow me, I will read to him the authority.

Mr. CANNON. I hope not, because I want to get out of the way of my friend the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] is recognized.

Mr. BURLESON. As I now understand it, this practice has obtained for ten or twelve years. Two or three years ago there developed among the horses and mules in Texas, southern Louisiana, and Mississippi a disease known as "charbon." Hundreds died, many planters losing mules worth thousands of dollars. There was no suggestion then that an appropriation be made by the Federal Government to pay for these animals destroyed or for quarantine purposes. This expense was either borne by the counties or by the individual owners of the animals destroyed. That is my understanding. I simply direct attention to the fact.

Mr. CANNON. I am not advised.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this clause about which we are concerned right now does not meet this emergency and does not meet the condition of affairs in the Agricultural Department for which it is hoped that the House will provide

When the Department of Agriculture was first organized, it having previously to that time been an independent bureau under a commissioner, all of the authority of the Commissioner of Agriculture was transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture; but that having been merely a bureau up to that time, certain authority had been vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. When the Department of Agriculture was organized, the force with which to carry out the authority vested in the Secretary of the Treasury was taken away from the Secretary of the Treasury and he was left with the bare naked power, and the bill organizing the Department of Agriculture failed to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture the powers which had been conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury.

One of those powers was to examine and certify concerning infectious and communicable diseases amongst animals. The consequence is we are faced with this queer condition of things, that the Secretary of Agriculture has been for twelve years exercising a power which the Supreme Court of the United States, on December 1, said Congress had the right to give him, but which Congress had not given him. So that if you make a bare appropriation with nothing further, the Secretary of Agriculture is left under that decision stripped of the power to do what we wish him to do.

I state this merely because on to-morrow the bill will come up from the Committee on Agriculture as we passed it there, and I do not want members of the House to think that this appropriation answers the purpose. It is absolutely necessary to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power now vested in the Secretary of the Treasury, in order that he may continue to do what he has been doing, but which the Supreme Court has just decided he has not the power conferred upon him by Congress to do.

Mr. CANNON. Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word. I am quite sure my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] labors under a mistake. I have no objection to the consideration of the bill to-morrow. I think very likely I shall vote for it. It is legislative in its provisions. But I call the gentleman's attention to the law making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the current year, and I read under the head of "Bureau of Animal Industry." There is a page and a half there containing this language:

> And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to use any part of this sum he may deem necessary to expend in such manner as he may think best to prevent the spread of pleuropneumonia, blackleg, tuberculosis, sheep scab, glanders or farcie, hog cholera, and other diseases of animals—

And so forth, and so forth.

Now, if that confers authority, this appropriation merely supplements it. And now I ask for a vote.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the gentleman to read a few lines further, to answer the question of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. CANNON (reading):

> And for this purpose to employ as many persons in the city of Washington or elsewhere as he may deem necessary, and to expend any part of this sum in the purchase and destruction of diseased or exposed animals.

Which power he has had for twelve or fifteen years under the law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, just one word in that connection. Notwithstanding this law which has just been read by the gentleman from Illinois, which was the law of the current year and in the last appropriation bill, the Supreme Court on the 1st day of December handed down a decision to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture did not have the power to give certificates or "clean bills of health," as you might call them, to herds of cattle, which would enable the owners of the cattle to carry them through another State without being subject to further examination and further exaction of fees.

The owner of a Texas herd of cattle was arrested by the authorities of the State of Colorado because he was attempting, under a certificate from the Secretary of Agriculture certifying that his herd was free of all communicable disease, to carry that herd through the State of Colorado.

He was sentenced to imprisonment. There was an appeal taken and the case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, which affirmed the decision of the court below. Now, then, it is upon this decision that the Secretary of Agriculture applies to the Committee on Agriculture to give him the power which he thought he had, and which the court in that decision says Congress has the right to give, but which, in its opinion, Congress has not given, so that the decision of the Supreme Court is to the effect that the very language which the gentleman has read is not sufficient to deal with the question.

Mr. CANNON. I will not yield further. Just a word. The gentleman is talking about one thing and I am talking about another. On the morrow, under the lead of the gentleman and his committee, we will or will not legislate. This is a bill that appropriates. I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the bill.

Mr. CANNON. One moment. I want to offer one amendment for material for folding.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman a question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has demanded the previous question.

Mr. CANNON (to Mr. FLEMING). The District Committee presses me, and I promised to get out of the way.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

On page 3, after line 12, insert the following:

"For wrapping paper, pasteboard, paste, twine, newspaper wrappers, and other necessary materials for folding, for the use of members of the House, and for use in the Clerk's office and the House folding room (not including envelopes, writing paper, and other paper and materials to be printed and furnished by the Public Printer upon requisitions from the Clerk of the House under the provisions of the act approved January 12, 1895, for the public printing and binding), $5,000."

Mr. CANNON. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois demands the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNION STATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up the District business.

Mr. BABCOCK. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 4825.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin, chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of Senate bill 4825.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. OLMSTED in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 4825, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 4825) providing for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, as it will be read for amendments in a short time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will say to gentlemen of the House interested in this new location that in a few minutes I will attempt to explain the map which has just been exhibited and endeavor to make the provisions of this bill clear, if I can have the attention of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I first entered Congress in the year 1893. At that time I became a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia, and the first important piece of legislation which was considered by that committee in the Fifty-third Congress was the question of the elevation of the railroad tracks and abolishment of grade crossings in the District of Columbia. The proposition before the committee at that time related to the Baltimore and Ohio road and involved an expenditure estimated at about $4,000,000. The answer made by the road at that time was this: "If you press this measure now, it means that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company must go into the hands of a receiver."

The committee listened carefully and attentively to what was said, and the bill, for the time being, was laid upon the table. The facts are that the Baltimore and Ohio did go into the hands of a receiver later, regardless of any action that Congress did not take. Mr. Chairman, this question has practically been before Congress for the greater part of the intervening time.

The first act of Congress in relation to the present site for the Pennsylvania depot was in 1872, when Congress confirmed the action of the board of aldermen and the common council of the city of Washington, which authorized the location of what is known as the Pennsylvania or Baltimore and Potomac station on the Mall at Sixth street. After some eight years of consideration by Congress public acts No. 49, relating to the Baltimore and Ohio, and No. 50, relating to the Baltimore and Potomac road, were passed and approved in February, 1901.

These acts provided for a new station on the present site of the Pennsylvania road at Sixth street and a new station at the corner of C street and Delaware avenue for the Baltimore and Ohio road. It was estimated that the cost of the elevation of the tracks and abolishing grade crossings, independent of the expense for terminals, would be $3,000,000 for each line. In the act No. 49 Congress appropriated $1,500,000 in money to pay for one-half the expense for the elevation of the Baltimore and Ohio tracks. It also appropriated, or, rather, turned over to the use of the Pennsylvania road, in lieu of money, real estate in the Mall and in other parts of the city, estimated in value at something more than $1,500,000. This, so far as the railroad companies were concerned, was considered a settlement of the whole question.

But soon after this legislation was had the Senate committee called on the respective lines and asked them to consider a union station. After many hearings and much discussion a plan was finally agreed upon by the engineers of the roads, the District Commissioners, and the Senate committee. The site selected and agreed upon was located at Massachusetts avenue, and the bill passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, but too late for careful consideration and action by the House committee.

I will endeavor to explain to the House just where this location is, so that members not familiar with the city will understand it.

As we take the cars from the Senate end of the Capitol on what is known as the F street line we go down Delaware avenue, and the first turn is at C street. This station is to be located two blocks farther down Delaware avenue and on Massachusetts avenue, at the intersection of the two avenues, which will be two blocks from C street and three blocks from the Capitol. The drawing before us shows the elevation of the station, which has a frontage of about 850 feet and a depth of nearly 2,000 feet.

When this proposition came to the House, and was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, your committee thought that the location of the union station at C street would be the most desirable and the best, for the reason that it would be located on the side of a hill, required no filling, and the most important point was that it changed the grade of no street and did not involve any damages to be paid by the District or the General Government.

It has been conceded, however, that the Massachusetts avenue site, while involving greater expense to the District and the General Government, was the most desirable when it was considered that we are building for fifty or one hundred years to come. However, your committee believed that the C street site was the most desirable, and, in fact, were ready to report a bill recommending the C street site, when we were confronted by two different propositions—one on the part of the railroad companies, who advised the committee that they would not build a depot at an expense of $4,000,000 on the C street site unless Congress insisted on its being located there and forced them to do so by legislation.

They further said that the Massachusetts avenue site was much more accessible to the public, and while it would cost them a great deal more to make this change than it did the District or the General Government, they were willing to expend this money. So far as they were concerned, they stated that the Massachusetts avenue site was the ideal one from a railroad standpoint and the only location acceptable and desired by them.

I want to add right here that it was estimated that the Massachusetts avenue site would cost the District and Government $1,600,000 for real estate, grading and paving, and damages to property over and above the expense of the C street site. These items were made up as follows:

Cost of grading and paving	$500,000
Cost of real estate to be purchased	500,000
Damages to property due to changes of grade	600,000
Making a total of	1,600,000

This, you will understand, involves the proposition for a plaza in front of the Massachusetts avenue station, which was not involved in the C street site. In other words, the difference in cost between the two sites to the District and the Government would be about $1,000,000. The proposition was made in committee that we reduce the amount of the contributions to the two roads, taking $500,000 from the Baltimore and Ohio road and $500,000 from the Baltimore and Potomac or Pennsylvania road, making a saving of $1,000,000, and locate the union station at the Massachusetts avenue site, as provided in the Senate bill. This would equalize the cost between the two sites to the District and the General Government, saying nothing about the expense of the plaza. This the committee has done, and has unanimously reported the amended Senate bill now before the committee for consideration.

Now, the changes which are brought about by the bill before you, as compared with existing law, briefly are as follows: A removal of the Pennsylvania depot and tracks from the Mall; a tunnel commencing at Virginia avenue and Second street and running between the Capitol grounds and the Library to a connection with the new depot at Massachusetts avenue. This tunnel runs on this side of the street, between the Capitol and the Library, and is about 50 feet under the surface of the ground at that point. The elevation provided under the present law for the Baltimore and Ohio tracks from C street and Massachusetts avenue is not necessary, and D and E streets remain open to the public.

A MEMBER. Does it make a grade crossing there?

Mr. BABCOCK. There will be no grade crossings anywhere in the District of Columbia, and there will be no viaduct or terminal structure this side of Massachusetts avenue, and North Capitol street will be open from the Capitol clear through to the Soldiers' Home.

The Senate bill provided that the Pennsylvania road, or the Baltimore and Potomac, shall receive $1,500,000 in cash in lieu of the real estate surrendered on the Mall and in lieu of the real estate given them under the act of 1901. This your committee has reduced by amendment to $1,000,000. As I said before, the change in the amount of these two appropriations will fully equalize the cost to the District and the General Government of the Massachusetts avenue site as compared with the C street site; and your committee believes, with those who drew the plans—with the Commissioners, with the Senate committee, and with the railroad companies—that Massachusetts avenue is the preferable, the most desirable, the most accessible, and, looking to the future needs of the city, the best site, when the cost is equalized as it is under the bill reported by the House committee with amendments to the Senate bill.

The sketch before you shows the elevation; and I want to say that the plans for all of this elevation and all the necessary work have been submitted and are on file with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and become a part of this act. The plans for the location of the station, the elevation of the tracks, and the grades are all filed with the Commissioners of the District of Columbia and simply referred to in the legislation. All of the work to be done is subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia. The committee regards this as a safty valve for any oversight or any lack of legislation covering necessary points. Any part or all of this work must be submitted to the Commissioners for their approval before it is finally completed.

One word further. The small map, under the one showing the elevation, gives the tracings of the tunnel, the location of the depot, and the tracks. Anyone who cares to look at it will see what streets are intersected and what streets are changed or vacated by these changes.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to ask a question or two, if this is the proper time. The elevation in the drawing before us represents the terminal station looking in what direction—south?

Mr. BABCOCK. Looking toward the Capitol, and right up Delaware avenue.

Mr. CANNON. That is on the north side of Massachusetts avenue. Now, then, how far from the property line of Massachusetts avenue is the beginning of the building?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, it is irregular. I think it is 200 feet on one end, and 150 feet, perhaps, on the other.

Mr. CANNON. Then it is from 100 to 150 feet from the property line. What is the width of Massachusetts avenue at that point?

Mr. BABCOCK. One hundred and fifty feet.

Mr. CANNON. Then the distance is from 260 to 300 feet from the front of the building looking south, to the southern boundary of Massachusetts avenue.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is correct.

Mr. CANNON. That is for the use of the public. Now, then, this bill provides for the condemnation of what is called the plaza park. Where is that?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is directly in front of the depot and takes in a part of six city blocks.

Mr. CANNON. That is south——

Mr. BABCOCK. South of the depot.

Mr. CANNON. And from 260 to 300 feet south of this public street?

Mr. BABCOCK. The plaza will extend from the front of the station building up to the south line of Massachusetts avenue, and from there will be circular in form, taking in a part of six city blocks.

Mr. CANNON. Is that plaza of 1,000 feet—part of six city blocks—to be opened for wheels and the use of the public, or is it a park merely?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is intended, as its name implies, as a park, through which two or three new streets are to be opened, all radiating, like the spokes of a wheel, from the front of the station building?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. Now, then, if the plaza park is to be condemned at the expense of the United States and of the District, presumably, to condemn it will cost what, as near as the gentleman can approximate?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Commissioners estimate the cost of the real estate to be purchased at $500,000 and the cost of grading and paving $500,000. Now, that second item covers all the changes of the streets from the boundary to the station, and the expense of grading the plaza and the streets.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; and to create this plaza park which we speak of now, to be paid for, half from the Treasury of the United States and half from the revenues of the District of Columbia, will cost in the neighborhood of $1,000,000, as near as can be estimated.

Mr. BABCOCK. I should think not so much as that. I would say, perhaps, $750,000.

Mr. CANNON. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. Now, then, for the convenience of the public, without the plaza park there is an average of nearly 300 feet immediately in front of the depot, and there you strike in that 300 feet Massachusetts avenue running to the northwest and the southeast, and how many streets running into Massachusetts avenue? Quite a number, I fancy.

Mr. BABCOCK. There are quite a number at that point. I think it is desirable to know just how many, and for that purpose I will refer to the map. There are two streets running into Massachusetts avenue in front of the proposed depot.

Mr. CANNON. In front of the depot, two streets running north and south; and, then, a little beyond that the whole street and avenue system which leads to various parts of the city, striking Massachusetts avenue.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman now whether, for all purposes of public convenience, the public will not be perfectly served without this plaza park?

Mr. BABCOCK. That question can hardly be answered by a direct yes or no. The public will be served and the depot building is easy of access at this point on account of the width of Massachusetts avenue and the streets that come into that avenue there, directly in front of or near the depot. The plaza will be a part of the park system here. As I understand it, the plaza is intended to be decorative in character to beautify that part of the city, and to make a suitable approach to the station, but its practical use to the station itself will not be great on account of the width of Massachusetts avenue and the space between the front of the station and this avenue. The plaza would accommodate bodies of troops or organizations coming here at inaugurals or at other celebrations, and meetings could be held there if desirable, as large numbers of people could be addressed in front of the station.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; but as we do not have the franchise in the District, perhaps they could go two blocks farther to another park.

Mr. BABCOCK. Very true.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, I will ask my friend if there are not several thousand parks, many hundreds of which are not cared for or improved, in the District at the present time?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, I think, Mr. Chairman, there are several hundred parks. I would not want to run it into the thousands without using a magnifying glass.

Mr. CANNON. I think that it will reach thousands, I will say to the gentleman. I will say to my friend that it seems to me if Washington is rich up to the point of poverty in anything on earth, it is rich in parks, owing to the manner in which it is laid out, not one-half of which are as yet improved. Now, considering this great improvement—and I am not sure that the committee is not to be complimented upon the reductions that it makes from the Senate bill of a million of dollars, substantially—considering the practical uses, I will ask my friend if it is not worse than a waste of money to add to the 300 feet in front of the depot this proposed plaza park at a cost of $750,000?

Mr. BABCOCK. Why, I think, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman states it pretty strongly. We must all agree that the plaza would be a very beautiful improvement in front of a station costing $4,000,000, but of course for its practical use in going to and from the station very little would be added by making this plaza. By doing so we open two new short streets in addition to the two that are there at present. So that the depot would be a little easier to reach with the plaza than it would without; but the fact we must all understand is that the plaza is a thing of beauty. That is the reason it is there and why it was designed—to bring out the harmony of the whole improvement.

Mr. CANNON. But would it not be more harmonious still if we should make the plaza include 10 acres, and would it not be more beautiful still if we should clean out all the buildings between the Capitol and the depot?

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, I would say to the gentleman that there is always a limit to the perspective. [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. Well, I will say to my friend that there is always a limit, in my judgment, to some other things, and the limit is reached when you go over 300 feet in front of the building for the use of the public and for beauty; and I want to say to him now that in my judgment this is a matter that dwelleth in the mind's eye of a commission that was created by Senate action alone; as I have once had occasion before to state, that the Senate begot upon itself, without the help of the House, this commission. There it is, and for one I want to be entirely practical and entirely generous; but when it comes to taking $750,000 out of the Treasury and devoting it to an additional park, small in area, like to the hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of parks improved in the District, and equally as many not yet improved, that it seems to me it is a piece of extravagance and a piece of badly conceived legislation to satisfy the mind of an architect who deals in sky lines only, that the House ought not to tolerate.

And I will test the sense of the committee a little later on, if the gentleman can not see his way clear to do it himself, or as some other member of the committee will not do it, on striking out that part that devotes $750,000 to creating a little park beyond the 300 feet that lies already, by this bill, to the south of the terminal station.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I will ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have ten minntes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Missouri.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. BARNES, one of his secretaries.

UNION STATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, the members of this House who were members of the last Congress will remember that in December, 1900, we had up some bills providing for the elevation of the tracks of the two railroads entering the city of Washington. I opposed those bills at that time as vigorously as I knew how.

I intend to vote for this measure, and I want to take a few minutes of the time of the House to explain, as I understand it, the difference between the two measures and my reasons for supporting the present legislation.

Those of the committee who opposed the bills of 1901 opposed them for three reasons: First, we thought there should be a union station in the city of Washington. Next, we did not believe that this Mall, the greatest public park in the city, should be ruined, as it would be, by permitting the Pennsylvania Railroad to cross it with some 15 or 20 tracks. Last, we did not believe that the Congress should, out of the Government revenues or the District's revenues, appropriate any sum of money whatever to aid a railroad in the building of its station or the betterment of its terminals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, as far as I am concerned, my views have not changed in regard to any of those propositions. I do not believe to-day that it is proper legislation to appropriate money to aid these railroads in the building of their terminals, but we are confronted with a condition and not a theory. We have in front of us the legislation of 1901, and unless this bill or some such bill is passed the railroads have now legislation under which they can, under which they say they will, and I believe they will, act, and under that legislation we will give a million and a half dollars in money to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. We will give to the Pennsylvania Railroad more than a million and a half of dollars' worth of lands in the public parks of the city, and the city will gain neither a union station nor have the Mall cleared of the tracks. Under this bill, it is true, we give $2,000,000 in money, but we recover back for the Government $1,285,582 in real estate that was given out of the heart of the Mall to the Pennsylvania Railroad in the last bill. Therefore, under this bill we acquire, first, a magnificent union station, the grandest, as I believe it will be, in the world when it is completed in accordance with the plans. We recover back this great park here in the center of the city of Washington, and we give only half a million dollars more in money for the accomplishment of these two great objects.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in view of these facts I intend to support this measure, saying frankly that if it came up upon first presentation, without existing law, I would oppose it because of the contribution of the $2,000,000 given by this bill to these railroads. But when we come in cutting down the Senate appropriation to $2,000,000, instead of $3,000,000, recovering back this $1,285,000 worth of property, and only giving half a million dollars of money above the present existing law, I think I can afford to support the bill. The situation as to the railroads is this:

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad will have to aid in the construction of the tunnel. Its expenses are increased something like $284,000 under this bill, and the appropriation to it is cut down half a million of dollars. So that railroad is about three-quarters of a million dollars worse off by the passage of this measure. But it has this advantage: It has a connection with the South for its passenger service such as it has been seeking ever since its entrance into the city of Washington and never before had an opportunity to obtain. The Pennsylvania Railroad is a million dollars better off. It had no money contribution heretofore; but as I have said before, we take back from that road $1,285,000 of the property given it by the act of 1901, and we add to the expense of that road more than three and a half million dollars in the necessary work it must incur for the construction of the tunnel and the increased cost of the building of the terminals and station.

Now, Mr. Chairman, one other thing. Be it remembered that in the construction of the line in the other bill we gave away a part of the greatest park of the city. In the contribution of land in this bill we give a small part of Garfield Park and one or two little reservations, and aside from that we give nothing in lands but rights of way over the streets, largely streets at present occupied by the roads, and we provide in the bill that in vacating any street or closing it up for traffic the roads must acquire the property abutting on these streets, so that no private property owner will be injured, and on the streets now and hereafter occupied there will be an overhead construction instead of on the surface, so that the private property owner is better taken care of and our streets are better provided for in the passage of this bill.

For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I intend to support this bill. As to the amendment as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], it is true the plaza could be stricken out of this proposed plan and still possibly leave sufficient accommodation for the roads and for the public. But I doubt the wisdom of such action. I have been informed that both in St. Louis and in New York, where they have great terminal stations, they have discovered they made a mistake in not providing for a plaza, or at least a public space in front of the depots to accommodate the traffic and street railroads. One thing further.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COWHERD. In a moment. I want to make an additional statement as to the expense. We do increase the expense to the District and the Government under this bill. That is, we provide the expense of that plaza, more than a million and a half dollars; but, as I have said before, we save practically a million dollars in the appropriations to the roads, so that, as compared with the existing legislation, for this $600,000 we get a union station with this great plaza and parking before it.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. If I understood the gentleman correctly, in getting this property we get an equivalent for the cash paid?

Mr. COWHERD. Under the existing legislation, as the gentleman will remember, passed two years ago, we gave 14 acres out of the Mall to the Pennsylvania Railroad, and the Commissioners of the District estimate the value of that property at about $1,285,000, or something more. We get back that property, as well as the streets that the railroad is now occupying in that neighborhood.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, does the gentleman figure that as an equivalent for the money paid?

Mr. COWHERD. We pay a million and get back a little more than a million dollars' worth of property. We gain very much by getting a union station and the opportunity to use the Mall as a whole instead of having it divided into two parts.

Mr. BABCOCK. Will the gentleman call the attention of the House to one other proposition—that this entails an additional expense upon the Pennsylvania Railroad of something over $3,000,000?

Mr. COWHERD. I just stated that this entails upon the Baltimore and Ohio an additional expense of $284,142, and reduces their appropriation $500,000; that it entails upon the Pennsylvania Railroad an additional expense of three and a half million of dollars, and makes their appropriation a million dollars in money instead of more than a million in land.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Missouri states that the value of the land which is retransferred is worth $1,300,000, as I understand.

Mr. COWHERD. That is the statement of the District Commissioners.

Mr. PERKINS. That, of course, has no commercial value; it is simply that amount of land added to the park system, which is now used by the railroads, which will hereafter form a part of the park system.

Mr. COWHERD. A small part of it has been used by the railroads, 4 or 5 acres, but under existing legislation, 14 acres were given to them.

Mr. PERKINS. None of this land would be available for the purpose of sale?

Mr. COWHERD. No; but instead of taking the 14 acres out of the center of the park, we have the 14 acres in the center.

Mr. PERKINS. Fourteen acres in the park system?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; the 14 acres lie in the center of that park. Take them out with the elevated tracks running over them, and the park is destroyed; that is, the opportunity to treat the park as a whole is destroyed.

Mr. PERKINS. The value that we get is having a better park?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; a very much better park.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The land that the gentleman refers to which we get from the railroad is land in the Mall?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; which we gave to them two years ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Did we give them the land?

Mr. COWHERD. I think we did.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I thought it was an easement only, subject to our will.

Mr. COWHERD. We gave them the right to run over and locate a depot and their tracks upon it, to cost several million dollars, and I think that would be a fee simple title when they once built upon it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think so, too, but we reserved the right to put them off whenever we pleased.

Mr. COWHERD. Yes; I remember some gentleman made that statement.

Mr. RIXEY. I would like to ask the gentleman how many blocks will be taken for the plaza?

Mr. COWHERD. The chairman has stated that the plaza is semicircular in shape, and it takes a part of six blocks—some only a little of the block and some all of it.

Mr. RIXEY. How near will it come to Pennsylvania avenue?

Mr. COWHERD. It does not come near Pennsylvania avenue; it runs up nearly to C street.

Mr. RIXEY. Does it go across Delaware avenue?

Mr. COWHERD. The plaza begins at the intersection of Delaware avenue and Massachusetts avenue, and lies on both sides of Delaware avenue.

[Mr. SIMS addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this new legislation, this scheme of a union depot, was not originally the plan of the two railroad companies. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Pennsylvania Railroad Company were well satisfied with the legislation that they received two years ago at the hands of the House and the Senate. During the course of the debate in the two Houses it was brought out very strongly that a sentiment existed in favor of preserving the Mall as it had been originally intended by those who laid out the city of Washington.

That sentiment grew day by day, and in deference to that sentiment and to a desire for a union station, which was expressed by Senator Butler in the discussion of this question in the Senate and by the late Senator McMillan, a member of the same committee, it was decided by those gentlemen to confer with the presidents of the two railroad companies and, if possible, get them to consent to the proposition for a union station. This was done, with the result that a year ago the presidents of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company and of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad agreed to consider the plan for a union station. This plan was placed in the hands of the architects who had in charge the development of the city of Washington. They decided that the proper location for this station was on the north side of Massachusetts avenue. They prepared a plan for a magnificent depot. In the development of this plan they considered it necessary to have in front of the station and on the south side of Massachusetts avenue a large plaza for the accommodation, let me say to the gentleman from Illinois, of those who land at this union station.

It was deemed by the architects having this matter in charge and by the Commissioners—by the Engineer Commissioner in particular—that there would not be sufficient space to accommodate the large crowds that would come to the union station on the occasion of the different national events that happen here at Washington; and so it was that they designed this plaza on the south side of Massachusetts avenue. A portion of this plaza is necessary for the further development of that plan in the laying out of streets to increase the facility of egress from the station. And now, with the plan that we have before us, there are streets radiating from this plaza in every direction. I have landed here at times with large bodies of men, and I know what it is to be placed out on a siding several miles from the station proper. It is just to avoid, in this new scheme for a union station, the possibility of such things as that that this plaza was considered a necessary part of the development.

Therefore I trust that in the consideration of this plan the committee will take into consideration these reasons, and will also realize that if on the occasion of national events we to-day find sufficient room without the plaza, we are not legislating for to-day, but for years to come. It was the idea of the architects who had this plan in charge to have something here that would be commensurate in every way with the dignity and size of the public buildings at present existing and those that are likely to be erected in the future.

It is scarcely necessary to argue that increased facilities at the different terminals are necessary. As they exist to-day they are practically not fit for the travel that comes into them. By the adoption of this plan for a union station we shall do away with the necessity of transporting across the city of Washington those who come from the North and from the West on the Baltimore and Ohio line; we shall avoid for those who come from the South the necessity of going through a tunnel, because under the proposed bill a station is designed to be erected at this end of the Long Bridge for the accommodation of those leaving Washington for the South and those arriving in Washington from the South. A further advantage will be that those coming from the North over the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad will not be compelled, as they now are, to go through a tunnel.

I have already referred to the large number of public events that happen in Washington which necessitate greater accommodations. These public events increase year by year, and as the country grows larger and richer increased accommodations will be necessary, not only for those who come as members of the different organizations that take part in these different events, but for those who come to witness the different events themselves. The present terminal facilities are such that on each occasion that there is an event which attracts people to the capital it necessitates not only the inconvenience of those arriving and departing, but practically the abandonment of anything like punctual freight handling for days before, owing to the necessary preparations, and for days after, owing to the congestion resulting.

If nothing else, Mr. Chairman, there is one provision in this bill which, to my mind, would absolutely make it incumbent upon us to pass it at this time; that is, the doing away with grade crossings. There is not to-day a city in the United States of one-half the size of Washington that has not for the past ten years been expending millions of money in the elimination of grade crossings; and if we do not take advantage of the opportunity now offered to us, the responsibility for any accidents resulting in the future from these grade crossings remaining will rest, I consider, upon our shoulders.

Mr. CANNON. Allow me to make a suggestion right there, and I do not do so from any unfriendly attitude with regard to the general features of the measure. Grade crossings ought to be avoided, and I think that, with some amendments, I shall vote for this bill. But the gentleman speaks of the great expense incurred in other cities by providing for grade crossings. Why, sir, in my city of Chicago—I call it mine because I live in Illinois—where there are many, many times the number of elevated tracks that there are here, the railways bear the whole of the great expense thereby incurred without the city bearing one dollar of it, whereas, if I read this bill aright, the expense in this city is to be borne very largely by the United States Treasury.

Mr. MORRELL. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], I would like to say that very probably the business resulting from the freight and traffic in the city of Chicago will many times exceed that handled in Washington.

Mr. CANNON. On the contrary, if my friend will allow me, there is no space in front of any depot in Chicago to exceed 90 feet, and that in a city of 2,000,000 people. Here we have 300 feet, and the gentleman's voice is still for more, at the cost of a best part of a million dollars, on account of the extraordinary traffic of this railway; so that my friend is not logical.

Mr. MORRELL. The gentleman has just remarked that there is only a limited space in front of his terminals in Chicago, and it is a pity there is not more space. May not future generations, if we do away with the plaza which is proposed here, say the same thing of us, and ask why, when we were building the terminals, we did not provide for more space in front of the station.

Mr. CANNON. Yet when you get 2,000 feet by 300 feet and then 160 feet beyond that for miles, tapping every street running north and south and avenues in every direction, you will have a space large enough for a city of five millions and a country of five hundred millions without this unnecessary expenditure, in my judgment.

Mr. MORRELL. At the present ratio of increase in population may we not expect that in time to come the city of Washington will have a population of 5,000,000?

Mr. CANNON. Well, if so, that population of 5,000,000 will then be quite competent to care for something in addition to this 300 feet of space, which is more than any railway terminal in the country has, so far as I know.

Mr. MORRELL. In relation to the amount of money carried by this bill in the appropriation, Mr. Chairman, in the wisdom of this committee it reduced the amount $500,000 in the cost of each of the railroads affected. The amount we are now appropriating and the amount asked for by the railroads the committee feels it can consistently appropriate, realizing that we are dealing with conservative business railroad men, and just here I would like to call the attention of this committee to the fact that these two railroads are pure and simple railroad corporations. They are railroads managed from beginning to end by railroad men. From the president of the road down to the humblest man employed, there is not a man who has not advanced step by step to the position which he now occupies, and in the financial departments of these roads the same conservative management obtains. They calculate exactly what may be expected from this, that, or the other improvement contemplated, with due respect to the increased resources and with a conservative protection in the interests of the stockholders.

These gentlemen rely purely and simply upon the earning capacities of the road and not upon the chance, as is done by those having in charge the management of most railroads, of driving the stock up or down in the open market.

Therefore I repeat that we thought we could consistently grant the amount of money carried in this bill. I am proud of the fact that one of these railroads carries with it the name of the State of Pennsylvania, which I have the honor to represent. I am proud of the fact that it is controlled, managed, and officered by Pennsylvanians, and to-day I am proud of the fact that they are knocking at the doors of New York, the metropolis of this country, with a proposition for the better comfort and convenience of their patrons, a proposition which in its engineering skill and daring has startled the business world, and which has been as carefully calculated in regard to its probable earning capacity, from a strictly railroad point of view, as has the plan for the great tunnel been calculated from an engineering standpoint.

I feel, Mr. Chairman, that we have before us a purely business proposition; a proposition favored by public sentiment; a proposition approved by the architects having in view the beauty of Washington; a proposition favored by the District of Columbia Commissioners; a proposition already passed by the Senate, and a proposition unanimously reported and indorsed by the House Committee on the District of Columbia.

When the bill comes up under the five-minute rule, there are certain amendments which I shall offer, in view of the fact that the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad have lately been amalgamated into what is to-day known as the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad. This new corporation has been duly incorporated in the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the Clerk will read. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, or the terminal company provided for in section 10 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings of railroads in the District of Columbia, to require and authorize the construction of new terminals and tracks for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," be, and each of them is hereby, empowered and authorized to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a double-track railroad, commencing at a point on the railroad of said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company at or near the crossing of Second street SW., at the elevation of said railroad provided for in the said act of Congress relating to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company approved February 12, 1901, thence curving toward the north crossing over Virginia avenue with a clearance of 15 feet above the present curb thereof, crossing over First street SW. and Delaware avenue SW., at a point about 40 feet north of the north house line of E street, with a clearance of not less than 16 feet; thence curving to the northward, crossing over Canal street and South Capitol street with a clearance of not less than 14 feet above the curbs thereof; thence passing under the intersection of D street with New Jersey avenue, C street SE., and B street SE. at the intersection with First street; thence continuing under the west side of First street to near E street NE.; thence curving to the eastward, crossing under the proposed circle at Massachusetts avenue to a connection with the tracks in the proposed terminal station to be built on the north side of Massachusetts avenue hereinafter provided for; thence running from the said north line of Massachusetts avenue on the terminal station structure hereinafter mentioned northeastwardly to Delaware avenue; thence, still on said terminal structure, and on the easternmost part of the viaduct, hereinafter mentioned, to be located in Delaware avenue, to the north side of M street NE.; thence northwardly still on Delaware avenue, crossing Florida avenue overhead, by means of a girder bridge, or by masonry arches, to the north side of said avenue; thence by a line, still northwardly, curving to the east, and crossing under New York avenue, by the most practicable route, in a general northeasterly direction, to a point on the north line of Montana avenue, as projected, and shown on plan filed as required by this act, from which terminal point the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, shall be, and is hereby, authorized to locate, construct, maintain, and operate a line of railroad, of two or more tracks, by the most practicable route, to a point of connection with its present railroad near Magruder Station, in the State of Maryland, and to acquire, from time to time, such lands between Montana and Florida avenues, and east of the present Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, as it may need for sidings, switches, yard tracks, with suitable structures and appliances, and other proper corporate purposes in connection therewith, and to use the same accordingly, subject to the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia; and a right of way 100 feet in width for said line of railroad as it shall be located through and upon lands belonging to the United States Reform School is hereby granted to and vested in said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, its successors and assigns, on such terms as the Attorney-General shall prescribe: Provided, however, That the portion of said line of railroad lying south of Florida avenue within the limits of the city of Washington shall be used for passenger trains only, except in cases of temporary emergency, and then for a period not exceeding twenty-four hours, unless with the consent of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

On page 1, line 11, after the word "hereby," strike out the words "empowered and," and after the word "authorized" insert the words "and required."

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection, the committee amendments will be submitted together. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in reference to the committee amendments, and certain other amendments which it is necessary to offer on account of the change of ownership of the Baltimore and Potomac road, that I will offer the committee amendments in bulk, as they will affect the entire bill, simply changing the name of the Baltimore and Potomac to the Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, which is now a Pennsylvania corporation.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to these formal amendments, and I understand them to be formal.

Mr. BABCOCK. Simply formal.

Mr. CANNON. I have no objection to their being considered as the gentleman requests, but I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that I desire to offer an amendment striking out certain words in line 2, page 2, in connection with an amendment striking out certain lines on pages 13 and 14, the object being to have, by unanimous consent, the privilege, after we reach page 14, to offer an amendment striking out in this place and the two places designated the provisions to which I have referred, it being the intention to enable the Committee of the Whole to pass its judgment upon the plaza park.

I ask unanimous consent that after page 14 is read I may have the privilege of going back for the purpose indicated, to offer in one proposition an amendment that will raise the whole question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that after the bill has been read he may go back to this section for the purpose of amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNION STATION.

SEC. 2. That the main passenger station and terminals for the accommodation of the passenger traffic of both the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, and the passenger traffic of such other companies as may be moved over the railroads of either of said two companies, with its consent, shall be constructed by said terminal company within the area described as follows, namely:

The following committee amendment was read:

After the word "companies," in line 23, strike out the words "with its consent" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as provided in section 11."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

BALTIMORE AND OHIO FREIGHT TRAFFIC.

SEC. 4. That in order to provide terminal facilities for the freight traffic of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in lieu of those which said company is now authorized to have within the area to be occupied by the passenger station and terminal described in the act relating to it, approved February 12, 1901, the said Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company be, and it is hereby, authorized and empowered (in addition to the power and authority conferred upon it by the provisions of said act relating to it, approved February 12, 1901) to locate, construct, maintain, and operate tracks, switches, sheds, warehouses, other structures, and facilities necessary or proper for a freight-delivery yard and terminal in Eckington, in, over, and upon the bed of Quincy street and Third street between New York avenue and R street, and in and upon the property bounded by New York avenue, Florida avenue, Eckington place, and R street, outside the limits of the city of Washington; and also within the city of Washington in, over, and upon the bed of Second street between M and N streets and in and upon squares 711, 712, and 713; and said company is hereby authorized to acquire, by purchase or condemnation, as provided in this act, the lands and property necessary for the additional freight facilities above mentioned.

The following committee amendment was read:

In line 3, page 10, after the word "thirteen," insert the words "and also to extend its tracks and switches north of V street on the east side of the main tracks of its Metropolitan Branch Railroad to Rhode Island avenue extended."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

STREETS TO BE VACATED.

SEC. 5. That to accomplish the purposes of this act the following-named streets, in addition to the streets vacated, abandoned, and closed by the provisions of said act relating to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, approved February 12, 1901, are hereby vacated, abandoned, and closed, to wit: In Eckington, T street shall be closed between the west line of Seventh street and the right of way of the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore and Ohio Railway Company; Thomas street from the west line of Seventh street westward; Seaton street from Sixth street to Seventh street; S street from Sixth street to the Brentwood road; Brentwood road from the west side of Seventh street to the south side of S street; Third street from the south side of R street to Florida avenue; Quincy street shall be closed and abandoned. No streets or avenues, except Ninth, Twelfth, and Fifteenth streets and New York avenue, shall be opened across the railroads constructed under authority of this act between Florida and Montana avenues; and said Ninth, Twelfth, and Fifteenth streets, when and as opened, shall be carried above the railroads by suitable viaduct bridges, the cost whereof, with their approaches within the limits of the right of way, shall be paid by the terminal company, but shall be maintained as in the case of other public highways in the District of Columbia: Provided, That the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall make adequate and suitable provision for carrying T street across the railroad right of way from the present Metropolitan Branch to the west line of Seventh street east by an overhead bridge in a manner satisfactory to the Commissioners. And the terminal company shall construct the necessary tunnels or viaducts to permit New York avenue to be carried with its full width between parking lines over their rights of way as herein authorized; and shall fill said avenue to a like width to the grade approved for said avenue for the purposes of this act across said right of way and westward to Florida avenue, and shall support the sides of said avenue with embankments or retaining walls wherever it abuts upon property belonging to said railroad, and nothing contained in the provisions heretofore made for the vacating of Third street and Brentwood road across said avenue shall operate to close said avenue in any way as a public thoroughfare at its full established width: And provided further, That the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company shall dedicate to the District of Columbia the necessary land to widen Eckington place on its east side to its full width in accordance with the recorded plans for street extensions, and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall dedicate to the District of Columbia the necessary land to form a western exit from Ivy street to Canal street as shown on the plan filed by said company as required by this act.

In the city of Washington, Ivy street between South Capitol street and a point 220 feet east thereof, Second street northeast between N street and Delaware avenue, and between the north side of M street and the south side of L street and so much of the bed of Delaware avenue as lies west of a line drawn parallel with the east building line of said avenue and 40 feet westerly therefrom; also all parts of streets included within the area of the terminal herein described, except H and K streets, it being the intention of this act that all streets, avenues, ways, and alleys within the area to be occupied and used for said terminal and terminal tracks shall be completely vacated, abandoned, and closed, and the use thereof and of any public reservation or street spaces of the United States within said area be granted to the company constructing such terminals for the purposes of the same, except that H and K streets shall be carried under said terminal and terminal tracks substantially in accordance with the plans agreed upon between the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the terminal company, and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and filed in the office of the Engineer Commissioner.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 25, page 10, after the word "abandoned," insert:

"Provided, That no streets or avenues shall be closed or abandoned under the provisions of this act or of the acts relating to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, approved February 12, 1901, until all of the property abutting on the streets or avenues, or portions thereof, provided to be closed in said acts shall have been acquired by said railroad company or companies or the terminal company referred to herein, either by condemnation or purchase, as hereinafter provided."

In line 21, after the word "street," strike out the word "across" and insert the word "over."

In line 22, after the word "way," strike out the words "from the present Metropolitan Branch."

In line 23, after the word "east," insert the words "by an overhead bridge."

The amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE PLAZA.

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to cause all streets, avenues, ways, and alleys to be closed as provided in this act, and in accordance with the intent thereof; and also to lay out a circle or plaza at the intersection of Massachusetts avenue and Delaware avenue, and to lay out and open streets leading to such circle, and to change the lines of certain other adjacent streets and of Ivy street, as shown on a plan filed in the office of the said Commissioner, and also to make such changes in the lines and grades of any existing street, avenue, or way and in the recorded plans of street extensions as may be reasonably required, deemed necessary, or advisable in the construction of the works hereby authorized. And authority is hereby given said Commissioners to acquire by purchase, or to condemn in accordance with existing law, the land necessary to carry out the proceedings authorized by this act, and to reconstruct, grade, and pave, by day labor or otherwise, the streets, avenues, and ways changed in line or grade or newly created hereunder.

And authority is hereby given the District Commissioners to sell or equitably exchange any portion of existing public space abandoned by reason of the adjustment of streets as an approach to the plaza or circle at Massachusetts avenue: Provided, That the provisions of section 3 of the act of February 12, 1901, in relation to new terminals for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company which vacate, abandon, and close D and E streets between First street and North Capitol street and Delaware avenue between C street and the south line of Massachusetts avenue be, and the same are hereby, repealed, and said streets are restored to the same status and ownership in all respects as they were prior to the passage of said act.

Mr. CANNON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. BABCOCK. I will ask the gentleman if he has any objection to waiting until we finish the reading of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. If such is the understanding of the committee, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The understanding of the Chair was that the second section was passed, with unanimous consent to recur to it for amendment after the gentleman from Illinois had offered his amendment, which he now offers.

Mr. BABCOCK. I ask unanimous consent that the section just read be passed, with the privilege of recurring to it and offering an amendment after the reading of the bill is completed.

Mr. CANNON. I will say to my friend that it seems to me that the action of the Committee of the Whole touching this amendment may or may not render other amendments apt later on. I think, perhaps, as we have now read all the provisions that will be covered by the amendment, we had better dispose of it now.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think it will save time if the gentleman will consent to my suggestion. We have already devoted pretty nearly an hour to that question.

Mr. CANNON. I do not intend to take much time on this matter, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BABCOCK. It can just as well be disposed of later.

Mr. CANNON. I hardly think so, because if it is the sense of the committee to maintain the bill as it is here now, I think the bill ought to be perfected in some of its provisions, for the borrowing of money for the District, and so on, and so on, matters not provided for, as well as the question of damages, which question would be reached on the next page. I rather think it had better be considered now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears objection. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, in lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "crossing under the proposed circle at Massachusetts avenue."

On page 13 strike out line 17 and all after the word "thereof" in line 21 down to and including line 25.

On page 14, in line 1, strike out the words "in the office of the said Commissioner" and all of lines 12 to 15, inclusive.

Mr. CANNON. I should like the attention of the gentleman in charge of the bill for a moment. What is the estimate of the amount of money that will have to be paid by the United States and by the District by virtue of this legislation?

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman refers to the plaza?

Mr. CANNON. No; the whole thing, and then I will get to the plaza later.

Mr. BABCOCK. The total amount of money appropriated in this and the two acts of last year amount to $3,770,000.

Mr. CANNON. Three million seven hundred and seventy thousand dollars. In round numbers $4,000,000. I will ask my friend if that includes the damages that are thrown upon the District and the United States on the part of the property to the north. I see here that would accrue by virtue of this elevation of 34 feet.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would say to the gentleman that two millions of that is a direct appropriation to the two different roads, and $1,770,000 is for the work to be done by the District of Columbia in changing the grade of streets, real estate to be purchased, filling, and the damages to property.

Mr. CANNON. That is $3,770,000?

Mr. BABCOCK. One million seven hundred and seventy thousand dollars.

Mr. CANNON. But there is two millions to the railroads, and then $1,770,000, making almost $4,000,000 directly payable. Now, then, in that view, I just want to call my friend's attention, by way of getting at what this bill does amount to; on page 15 I find:

All damages to adjacent property owners resulting from, incidental to, or connected with changes in the grades of the streets or alleys authorized by this act shall be borne, paid for, and defrayed by the District of Columbia, and shall be recoverable by action of law against the said District on the part of the owners of the property so damaged. Fifty per centum of the amounts so recovered shall be refunded to the said District by the United States.

Now, as I understand that provision, it gives every citizen in the District of Columbia adjacent to or near by this proposed 34 foot of fill in this reservation an action in the District courts before District juries for damages, and, when damages are recovered the District is to pay it and the United States is to reimburse the District one-half. Am I correct? Can any man on earth tell how much that is to be? If not, what is the best estimate of the amount?

Mr. BABCOCK. I do not understand the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the gentleman will permit me, he should not overlook the fact that the jury in estimating the damages will be required to take into consideration the enhanced value of the adjacent property.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It certainly will enhance the value of all property adjacent to that magnificent depot.

Mr. CANNON. How wide is the reservation—2,000 feet?

Mr. BABCOCK. What reservation?

Mr. CANNON. Where it reserves it?

Mr. BABCOCK. The depot has 750 feet front. This reservation extends, I should say, between 900 and 1,000 feet, the width of it, in front of the depot.

Mr. CANNON. How far does it run through the city?

Mr. BABCOCK. From the front of the depot?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I am not prepared to say; but from a comparison I should say two to three hundred feet.

Mr. CANNON. Well, but there is an elevation clear out through the city.

Mr. BABCOCK. The elevation?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. BABCOCK. I understood the gentleman to be referring to the plaza.

Mr. CANNON. No; I am talking about the elevation. How much is there?

Mr. BABCOCK. Of change of grade?

Mr. CANNON. Yes. How long and how wide is that?

Mr. BABCOCK. The change? Well, it is impossible to answer that question. One block in this direction and perhaps two or three blocks in that direction.

Mr. CANNON. I will put it in another way. How many acres from boundary to Massachusetts avenue are covered by these terminals and tracks where the elevation will be 34 feet above the surrounding property down to a similar elevation of 40 or 50 feet, or how much?

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, that would be covered by taking Massachusetts avenue, because that is the greatest point of elevation, at the lowest depression, 34 feet 5 inches, and from that on less out to the surface where it strikes grade.

Mr. CANNON. Where does it strike the surface, at boundary or beyond?

Mr. BABCOCK. It is less than the grade at C street. C street is higher than Massachusetts avenue.

Mr. CANNON. How much?

Mr. BABCOCK. C street is 10 feet higher than the Massachusetts location.

Mr. CANNON. I understand, but how about the other point to the north? C street is to the south.

Mr. BABCOCK. Well, I will explain that this particular point where the depot is to be located is the lowest point in that part of the city.

Mr. CANNON. And has a 34-foot fill?

Mr. BABCOCK. At the lowest part.

Mr. CANNON. The whole thing seven or eight hundred feet broad, and how long?

Mr. BABCOCK. The station proper?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; out to the north. I want to know how long it is?

Mr. BABCOCK. The fill runs out very quickly in going out the other way, because the elevation across the street is not sufficient, so that the street has to be depressed to get under it.

Mr. CANNON. Now, then, the damages from the extraordinary fill are to be borne by the District. Has my friend any estimate of what those damages will be?

Mr. BABCOCK. The Commissioners estimate the damages to property at $600,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I will ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois ask that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The estimate of the Commissioners is that $600,000, in addition to the four million——

Mr. BABCOCK. Oh, no; that is a part of the $1,770,000.

Mr. CANNON. A part of it. Now, what have we to cover the whole?

Mr. BABCOCK. Three million seven hundred and seventy thousand dollars covers the two millions appropriated for the two railroads, and the $1,770,000 covers all other items and the work to be done by the District of Columbia.

Mr. COWHERD. That includes $170,000 created under the act of February, 1901?

Mr. BABCOCK. One hundred and seventy thousand dollars of that applies to East Washington under the old law. Sixteen hundred thousand dollars is the estimate of the Commissioners for the other work.

Mr. CANNON. Does my friend have any idea that when you elevate above these streets 34 feet, as has been stated, and depress some of the streets, and then everybody that conceives themselves to be damaged, and is sent to the courts, and provision is made to pay the judgments—does my friend have any idea that $600,000 will pay those damages?

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman must consider one thing, and that is that the great bulk of this property belongs to the railroad companies. They own practically two blocks from C street and Massachusetts avenue, and also the property adjoining Delaware avenue, and this bill provides that no street can be closed unless they own all the abutting property. So that the percentage of property that will not be used by the railroad is small. It is not one-half of the property, because they own the bulk of the abutting property.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman does not make himself understood, or else I do not. This elevation is 34 feet above the surface of the earth. Upon each side is private property.

Mr. BABCOCK. Railroad property.

Mr. CANNON. The railroads do not own to the east and west?

Mr. BABCOCK. They own some of the property where the plaza is to be located.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking about the property east and west; the man that does not abut, but is a block off, is entitled to damages. Does the gentleman contend that the railroad owns the property half a block or a block off to the east and west?

Mr. BABCOCK. They do own two blocks to the south of the depot.

Mr. CANNON. I am not speaking about the south; I am speaking of the property east and west; it is not contended that the railroads own there, and there is a depression and elevation. In other words, anybody that lives within half a mile or a quarter of a mile that conceives himself more or less to be damaged can apply to the courts.

Mr. BABCOCK. Wherever the grade is changed.

Mr. CANNON. The grade is changed by filling up to this great amount.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman must understand that in this direction—I am not sure that I am familiar with the points of the compass—it runs right into a hill within two blocks.

Mr. CANNON. I understand. Now, then, I will take the gentleman's estimate at $600,000 damages. So that in round numbers this bill provides that the United States and the District shall pay $4,000,000 hands down. Now, then, I want to call the attention of the House to this fact, that we held up the District bill at the last session week in and week out, and finally forced a personal-property tax, which personal-property tax, added to a reassessment of the real estate, barely furnishes money enough to clear the teeth of the District. There is upon us sanitary sewerage to cost many hundred thousands of dollars. There is upon us an additional water supply, the filtering of the water, so as to make it healthy for all its inhabitants, and many other important improvements that have to be provided for either by increase of taxation or by the Government paying one half and advancing from its Treasury the other half.

Now, the burden of this $4,000,000 is put upon the District and the Government, leaving the District without one dollar to pay it; and the burden, after we fasten it upon the District, is to be provided for by Congress after this legislation is enacted.

Mr. BABCOCK. I know the gentleman does not intend to mislead the House——

Mr. CANNON. Certainly I do not.

Mr. BABCOCK. But he should bear in mind that his bill carries only $600,000 more than the present law; so that, instead of $4,000,000 to be considered, it is only $600,000; and that is the item the gentleman referred to as the estimate for damages.

Another thing: The gentleman is familiar with the fact that in the estimates so far furnished to Congress by the Commissioners for damages of opening streets—and there have been many such cases—the rule has been that the damages allowed by the court and juries have been less than the estimates submitted by the Commissioners.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, I have another object in calling attention to this matter. I do not care whether this burden of $4,000,000, put upon the District and the United States Treasury, arises in part from former legislation or not. I am dealing with the present legislation and considering what the enactment of this proposed measure will do.

I am willing to follow the lead of the gentleman from Wisconsin and the gentleman from Missouri and the committee, and to vote for this bill after it is properly amended. But I am speaking of the status. We march up to the fact that existing legislation and the provisions of this bill put $4,000,000 upon the District—one half to be paid from the United States Treasury and the other half from the District—without the District, under existing legislation, having one red cent to meet this indebtedness. Now, when Congress has voted the burden and when we come to appropriate a little further on, then, I suppose, we shall have to recover the horse by locking the stable door after he has been stolen. So much for that. I merely want to take an account of stock.

The gentleman says that the damages to be paid under this new legislation will amount only to $600,000. My judgment is that the sum named is not one-half of what will have to be paid. But I take the gentleman's estimate, or that of the District Commissioners. Now, what does my amendment do in this connection? My amendment cuts out the ornamental park that is confessedly to cost $700,000. In my judgment, it will cost twice that amount without the improvements. Who owns the land? The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company owns the land, which we shall take by condemnation, in the main, for this plaza park. Now, I have nothing against the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. I glory in our great transportation companies for the convenience and business of the country. Civilization would stop without them. But that company has this property; and as it has it, I am willing it should keep it, because "Uncle Sam" and the District do not want this park.

Now, I crave the attention of the committee while I ask gentlemen to observe particularly the design of this new depot with the plaza in front of it. There [indicating on the plan] is the magnificent depot that is to be built. And I am for a magnificent depot. In front of that depot is the great Massachusetts avenue—not like a 60-foot Chicago street; not like a 75-foot New York street—in front of this big terminal.

A MEMBER. One hundred and twenty feet is the width of a New York street.

Mr. CANNON. Well, this is 160 feet, to which 140 feet are to be added, giving 300 feet here [indicating] without any plaza park; and this width extends about 800 feet in front of this great depot, because the depot stands 100 feet north of the property line of Massachusetts avenue, over that 120 or 130 feet, giving, as the gentleman says, an average space from that point south across Massachusetts avenue of 300 feet for a distance of 700 or 800 feet, and then it takes it up 160 feet wide along the immense length of that great avenue each way, and then that great avenue is tapped by streets almost everywhere on each side and by other avenues.

Now, in addition to this 300 feet, the bill provides for a plaza, the ground for which is to be condemned, running around in this direction [indicating] on the south side. This 300 feet is to be bought from the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, or condemned from their property.

Now, if we need it, although we are running the District in debt $2,000,000 without the District having one cent of money, and thereby morally binding ourselves to take care of that amount from the United States Treasury—if it is necessary to expend this $700,000 for this park, to be added onto this 300 feet already existing, then, let us do it. But if it is not necessary, let us cut down this burden $700,000. This is what the plaza park will cost, according to the statement of the gentleman in charge of the bill, for condemnation of the ground. But when we get it, it lies there 34 feet below the adjacent property, and before you can utilize it——

Mr. WANGER. Will the gentleman permit a question for the purpose of information?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. WANGER. The plaza will take very little private property, will it not, as compared with other parks or with the public streets?

Mr. CANNON. Take $700,000 worth, by the admission of Brother BABCOCK. [Laughter.]

Mr. WANGER. Yes; but it only extends the area, judging from inspection of the map, to 100 feet from the station right in front.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no.

Mr. WANGER. To the park.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no. It is 300 feet from the front of the station before you reach the beginning of the plaza park.

Mr. WANGER. If I understand the lines, they extend only about 100 feet beyond that, beyond the street line. What I want to get at is this: Will not all this grading be required whether we have the plaza park or not, or if we do not have the grading will we not have a station up in the air?

Mr. CANNON. In one direction for a short distance, but we have got the streets to get around.

Mr. BABCOCK. The grading will be required in the streets, but not the filling up. To make the plaza the streets will have to be graded, at any rate.

Mr. WANGER. But if the streets are graded up, would not heavy damages accrue to the owners of the private property adjacent?

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Ah, but we do not propose to have any streets across this plaza, because the plaza is private property, owned by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, and we propose, if this amendment is adopted, to leave that private property in the hands of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad.

Mr. WANGER. But, if my friend will permit, that private property is adjacent to these public streets which will have to be graded, and if you grade them up 34 feet or anything like that, will there not be very heavy damages accrue to the owners of the private property?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I have already stated that $600,000 of damages thrown upon the District on account of these elevations, in my judgment, is not advisable. I think it will cost twice and perhaps three times that much, but I am accepting the estimate of the Commissioners of the District.

Now, then, what is there in favor of this class of parks—a breathing space? Why, if there is anything that we have to throw at the birds, without damage, it is breathing spaces in the city of Washington. We have parks at all our intersections of the streets and avenues, great squares, hundreds and hundreds and hundreds of them—splendid, magnificent—yes, enough parks for a city of 2,000,000 people, all to be improved by and by. Now, what is the sense of burdening the city, which has to carry almost four millions with the United States Treasury because of this and former legislation, by six, seven, or eight hundred thousand dollars more? And to do what? To give a sky line!

Is it needed when the trains come thundering in and we already have 300 feet of space in front of the great depot seven to eight hundred feet long, then for miles and miles 160 feet wide, and then at every three or four hundred feet our streets and avenues setting in and leading off in every direction? It is not needed for the convenience of the citizens of Washington or the convenience of the people of the United States, even though you multiply our population by five. Well, who said to put it there? This commission, created by the Senate, composed of three gentlemen—two architects and one landscape gardener. That commission traveled all over Europe at the expense of the Senate contingent fund, and finally the funds had to be reenforced by $50,000, and the House said that we would never give it unless the Senate submitted to an amendment which would put it out of the power of the Senate to make appropriations and spend the public money at its own sweet will.

The law was amended, so that is behind us; but here it is, this magnificent scheme, a model of it, reposing over here in the Library of Congress. It was made without authority of law and it is housed in the great Library of Congress building without authority of law. There it is. Behold, how pretty! I went over there one day with my usual slouch hat on, and the man in care of it did not know who I was—sized me up right the very first time, for a countryman from Illinois. I went around and looked at it with mouth and eyes wide open. I said, "What is this and that and the other?" He pointed it out. Said I, "Do you suppose they will ever do it?"

"Oh, yes; it is begun now."

"What is it to cost?"

"The best information is that when complete it will cost a thousand millions!"

"Do you reckon that the people will stand it?"

"Oh, yes; nothing too good for the capital city."

That is all right. Enough is as good as a feast; and when this great terminal is provided for at an expense of $4,000,000, whereas other cities make the transportation companies provide the terminal at their own expense, that is enough. Let us let the sky lines and the additional space that may be needed some time in this plaza park in the year 4967 be cared for by the people then living, and I therefore offer this amendment. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, the question before the House, it seems to me, is simply this: Congress has passed legislation which involves the Government and the District of Columbia in an expenditure of about $4,000,000, if I understand it, with provision for two depots, one on each side of this city. The Committee on the District of Columbia have arranged unanimously for one depot for this city, and it will cost $600,000 more to provide for this one depot, the way the committee have arranged it, than to provide for the two under the present legislation. Now, we get up propositions appropriating $50,000,000 or $100,000,000 and nobody opens his mouth. Get up a proposition involving a few hundred thousand dollars and everybody is on his feet for economy. The Committee on the District of Columbia say the present project is the better one, and I am willing to follow a committee that have had a great and troublesome question like this before them for years when they bring in a proposition for a union depot for all the railroads.

You can not get rid of grade crossings in any city without the expenditure of large amounts of money. New York City paid to the New York Central one-half the expense of lowering the tracks of that road. Now, why should we haggle about $600,000, involving the question whether we get the right kind of a station for $600,000 more, when we get it in a shape that is approved by everybody who knows anything about railroading or has any idea of beauty or convenience?

Let us adopt the new proposition in place of the old. [Applause.]

Mr. MORRELL. Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the railway station at Providence, R. I. In front of that railway station there is a plaza exceeding in width 350 feet, and in length about 800 feet.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me, everybody who goes to Providence needs a thousand times more space than the ordinary citizen, because the people who go there have both time and money to throw at the birds, and that pastime, you know, requires a great deal of space. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRELL. I am simply stating a fact which perhaps may interest others if it does not interest the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, it does interest me.

Mr. MORRELL. The width of that plaza at Providence is 350 feet, and it is some 800 feet long, and there is in addition to that a street some 150 feet in width, making a total of some 500 feet in width of the plaza directly in front of the station.

The distinguished Representative from Rhode Island [Mr. CAPRON] has told me within a very few minutes that the people of Providence would almost rather do away with the station than do away with the plaza, owing to its convenience to the people arriving and leaving Providence.

I should like also to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the increase in the assessed value of property which has resulted from every terminal station that has been built. Within my own time I remember in the city of Philadelphia the condition of the property around Penn square before the Pennsylvania built what is now known as the Broad street terminal. Let anybody who cares to investigate the subject compare the value of property there to-day with what it was before that terminal was established. The same thing is true in relation to the Reading terminal at Twelfth and Market streets. There has been the same increase in the value of property, and therefore the same increase in revenue to the municipality. It is therefore not fair for us to take the conditions existing at present, before the terminal has been built, as a fair showing of the advantages that will accrue to the city of Washington; but let us consider what those advantages will be after the terminal has been built, both in the matter of convenience in travel and also in the matter of the increase in value of property at that point.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether any agreement has been reached with respect to the cost of the property in this plaza which we are expected to acquire?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman that that will be impossible. A portion of this property belongs to the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Well, we are dealing with the Baltimore and Ohio, are we not?

Mr. BABCOCK. We are dealing with the owners of the property. A portion of it belongs to private individuals. I understand that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company have made a proposition to the Commissioners in which they say that the District can have any part of that property, anything that they own or need, at the price they paid for it. I know nothing about it, any further than that the statement has been made.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Of course the gentleman knows that the moment we pass this legislation and authorize the construction of this station at the place designated all the property in that vicinity will appreciate in value promptly, and the cost ought to be ascertained definitely, it seems to me. We ought to know what we can get this property for before we seek to establish this public plaza.

Mr. BABCOCK. I want to say to the gentleman there have been four depot propositions considered by Congress, and it would take a very wise man and a great deal of labor to contract for all the property wherever we might see fit to locate a depot. The point is, whether it belongs to the Baltimore and Ohio or to an individual, there is no way to compel them to set the price. The Baltimore and Ohio and the Pennsylvania are not interested in the plaza. It does not make any difference to them whether the District sees fit to provide for it or not.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Are not we doing this at the suggestion of these companies?

Mr. BABCOCK. Not at all. This plaza is the suggestion of the Park Commission and adopted by a Senate committee. The roads would be glad to have their depot beautified by this plaza in front of it, but it is no necessary part of the station proper, nor does it enhance the value of it except that it will give them a little more room in front of the depot.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin this direct question, If we are not taking many chances to the disadvantage of the Government when we authorize this proposition, not knowing what the price of this property will be?

Mr. BABCOCK. I will say to the gentleman the usual proceeding is to condemn the property.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Ah, that is all well enough, but the compensation must be full compensation.

Mr. BABCOCK. That is very true.

Mr. GILBERT. In cases of compensation for damages the enhanced value of the property which accrues by reason of the location of the depot is not an enhancement to which the present owners of the property are entitled.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am not so sure about that. The property is undoubtedly high to-day, and will be enhanced to-morrow.

Mr. GILBERT. That is a matter which is well settled.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I am quite familiar with that branch of the law myself, and I insist without any fear of contradiction that the question of value will be determined at the time of the taking and not upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. BABCOCK. If the gentleman will read the bill he will find that it provides that betterments are to be charged to the property.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Betterments are often fictitious. The verdict will be the actual value at the time the petition of condemnation is filed and the proceedings begun; but it seems to me it will be a very little thing, considering the interests involved, for this committee to insist on having a definite, distinct understanding as to the price of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company for their property.

Mr. GILBERT. So far as I have investigated the question, in condemnation cases it is necessary to ascertain the value of the property of the citizen just before the time it was known this property would be located upon it that would enhance its value, and which enhancement accrues by reason of the location of the depot, and that is the value that the Government has to pay for.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky hold that the value of the property condemned relates to the time prior to the commencement of the proceedings?

Mr. GILBERT. Certainly. He must show that the location of the depot there will not necessarily enhance the value of the property, and the jury will be instructed to ascertain the value of the property just before it was known that the depot was to be placed there.

Mr. MANN. That would not be the law in any place that I have been.

Mr. GILBERT. That is the law where I practice, and I have had a great many condemnation cases.

Mr. MANN. I have been in that class of business all my life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to ask me a question.

Mr. WANGER. I desire to know whether the grading in front of the station is a necessary incident to the plan for the erection of the station and the elimination of grade crossings, or whether it is an incident to the plaza?

Mr. BABCOCK. The grading of the streets must be done regardless of the plaza, whether the plaza be made or not. That has nothing to do with the grading of any of the streets.

Mr. WANGER. Now, the grading of the streets would necessarily inflict a considerable damage upon the properties which it is proposed to take for the plaza?

Mr. BABCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. One more question, if the gentleman will permit me. I notice that this language is used in the first page of the report of the Commissioners:

This report has been delayed on account of not receiving from the railroad companies a statement of the cost of the proposed work and of the value of some of the land owned by the Baltimore and Ohio Company which it will be necessary to acquire under the bill and which the president of the company stated would be sold to the District for street purposes at cost price.

Mr. BABCOCK. For street purposes?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I ask whether that will cover this proposition to make a plaza there?

Mr. BABCOCK. A portion of it, yes; but not all of it, because two streets are laid out to reach the plaza. The plaza proper is not a street and would not be covered by that language.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. It seems to me that we ought to know now the value and the cost of that property.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I understand in a general way that the Baltimore and Ohio road has made this proposition, to turn over any of the property it has acquired to the District at the price paid for it. That has not been presented to the committee and has not been presented to Congress. I do not know that it is in writing. It is a matter between the road and the Commissioners.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendments offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], and without objection they will be submitted in gross.

There was no objection.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON) there were 48 ayes and 106 noes.

So the amendments were rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

DAMAGES.

All damages to adjacent property owners resulting from, incidental to, or connected with changes in the grades of the streets or alleys authorized by this act shall be borne, paid for, and defrayed by the District of Columbia, and shall be recoverable by action of law against the said District on the part of the owners of the property so damaged. Fifty per cent of the amounts so recovered shall be refunded to the said District by the United States: Provided, That in determining the damages as herein provided the jury shall take into consideration any benefits that may have accrued by reason of the location of said station in proximity to the property alleged to have been damaged.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 12, page 15, insert after the word "reason" the words "of the elimination of grade crossings or."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

TAXATION.

SEC. 6. That the property owned or occupied by the terminal company, or by the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, or by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company under authority of this act or otherwise, together with the improvements that may be put thereon, shall be subject to taxation in the District of Columbia in the same manner and to the same extent as other property in the District, and all tracks and sidings shall be taxed as real estate: Provided, That no assessment, valuation, or tax shall be made, laid, or levied on the stations, terminals, and lines of railroad located, constructed, or maintained under the authority of this act in excess of that which would or could be lawfully made, laid, or levied if said stations, terminals, and lines of railroad were located, constructed, and maintained without the use of bridges, tunnels, viaducts, retaining walls, or other structures necessary or properly employed to elevate or to depress the same as required by this act; it being the true intent and meaning hereof that the lines of railroad and terminals hereby authorized (except such portions of the viaduct as may be constructed and used for storage or like commercial purposes) shall be assessed and valued for the purpose of taxation and taxed on the same basis as if the same were not constructed and maintained by means of such bridges, tunnels, viaducts, retaining walls, and other structures.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

Page 15, line 18, insert after the word "the" and before the word "viaduct" the following: "terminal structure or."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Beginning with the word "except," in line 9, page 16, strike out down to and including the word "purposes," in line 11; in line 14, after the word "structures," add "except such portions of the terminal structures or viaduct as may be constructed and used for storage or like commercial purpose shall be subject to taxation in the same manner as other property in the District of Columbia."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1634) to remove the charge of desertion against Thomas Cordingly.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution No. 61.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the two Houses adjourn on Saturday, December 20, they stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian, Monday, January 5, 1903.

UNION STATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, a word in explanation. The language in parentheses was intended to make such part of the structure as was used for commercial purposes subject to a taxation, but it comes in such a way as to except it from taxation instead of making it liable to taxation in the opinion of several members, and I have offered this amendment in order to make it certain. I understand that the chairman accepts it.

Mr. BABCOCK. I think the amendment, Mr. Chairman, ought to be adopted. It makes the language more clear.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

REMOVAL OF TRACKS FROM THE MALL.

The construction of the lines of railroad hereinbefore mentioned, connecting the railroad of said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company with said main passenger station and terminal, whether constructed wholly by said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company or said terminal company, or partly by each, shall relieve said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company of any and all duties and obligations respecting relocation of its present passenger tracks and terminal, and location, construction, and operation of new passenger station and new terminal tracks, as prescribed in the act relating to it, approved February 12, 1901; and upon completion either by said railroad company or said terminal company, or in part by one and in part by the other, of said connecting lines of railroad ready for use, in connection with said main passenger station and terminal, as contemplated by this act, and within five years from the passage of this act the said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall be, and it is hereby, required to remove its present eastern connection between its passenger station and its line on Virginia avenue via Sixth street, including the tracks on said last-named company, or upon Southern Railway Company, shall remain and continue in full force, and with like effect as if herein reenacted at length; and all rights, powers, and privileges granted to, or duties imposed upon, said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company by this act shall accrue to and devolve upon its successors and assigns, as provided by section 15 of said act relating to said Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, approved February 12, 1901, and all provisions of said section shall be applicable thereto in all respects and in like manner as they are made applicable to the rights, privileges, and duties granted to or imposed upon said company by said last-mentioned act.

Mr. KEHOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert following, after word "assigns," line 14, page 19, to wit: "one-half to be paid."

And insert the following after "appropriated," line 16, page 19, to wit: "and the other half to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia."

Mr. KEHOE. Mr. Chairman, I notice that one-half of the sum to be paid to the Baltimore and Ohio is to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia and the total appropriation to the other railroad is to be paid by the Government, so that the Government pays $1,500,000 and the District only $500,000; and I offer this amendment for the purpose of making the District of Columbia bear one-half of the appropriation for the Pennsylvania as well as for the Baltimore and Ohio.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, in the act No. 50, passed in 1901, the General Government appropriated for the use of the Pennsylvania Railroad certain real estate, largely of the Mall. The present bill provides that this real estate on the Mall, amounting in value, at $2.50 a foot, to $1,285,523, shall be restored to the General Government as a part of its park system. As this House is well aware, all the parks in the District of Columbia belong to the General Government in fee simple. The Government gets the property, it reverts to the Government, and, in fact, they get much more property in dollars and cents than is appropriated, and the committees of the House and Senate believed that the General Government should take this burden and pay this appropriation of $1,000,000 for the property returned to the Government.

Mr. KEHOE. Is it not a fact that when this land goes back to the Government it will be used by the city for parking purposes in the same way as other parks are used?

Mr. BABCOCK. I suppose so.

Mr. KEHOE. And will not the District, instead of the General Government, get the benefit of it?

Mr. BABCOCK. Does not the gentleman understand that all of the parks in the District of Columbia belong to the General Government, and are under the supervision of the Secretary of War? The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have no more authority over a piece of parking than you have.

Mr. KEHOE. But is it not a fact that the District has in every other case borne one-half the expense of any appropriation of this kind?

Mr. BABCOCK. That is an entirely different proposition. This is a case in which real estate to the value of $1,285,000 is turned back to the General Government. Why should the District pay any portion of this expense?

Mr. KEHOE. Did not this land belong originally to the Government, and did the railroad company ever pay a cent for it to the Government?

Mr. BABCOCK. It was a contribution toward the elevation of the tracks. The gentleman loses sight of the fact that Congress in 1901 proposed to pay one-half the cost of the elevation, and the proportion of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company was to be received in real estate, while the proportion of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad was to be paid in cash.

Mr. KEHOE. Is it not a fact, however, that the company never paid a cent in money for what the Government is now getting back?

Mr. BABCOCK. I repeat, it was a part of the contribution for the elevation of the tracks. Of course the Pennsylvania Railroad never paid a cent for the land; neither did the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad ever pay a cent for the money that it received. This was an expenditure for the elevation of the tracks, not for terminals or depots.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. KEHOE, it was rejected.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read the following amendments to section 9:

Page 20, line 25, strike out the words "is included within such location" and insert in lieu thereof the words "can be so acquired."

Page 22, lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "with its consent" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as provided in section 11."

The amendments were agreed to.

The next amendments, to strike out sections 11, 12, and 13, respectively, were read and agreed to.

The next amendment was read and agreed to, as follows:

Insert as section 11 the following:

"SEC. 11. That any railroad company now or hereafter lawfully existing and authorized to extend a line of railroad into the District of Columbia, or having secured the right to operate over the lines of any other then existing railroad, to a point of connection with the tracks of said terminal company, shall have the right to the joint use of said station and terminals upon the payment of a reasonable compensation for the use of the same; and if the parties are unable to agree upon such terms, then the same shall be prescribed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, upon petition of either party in interest, under such rules of procedure as the said court shall prescribe."

The next amendment was read, as follows:

Insert as section 12 the following:

"SEC. 12. That the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall establish and maintain a substation at a convenient location east of the north end of the Long Bridge and at a point to be approved by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia."

Mr. RIXEY. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in the proposed new section 12, after the word "substation," the following: "With suitable accommodations for passenger travel."

Mr. RIXEY. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the chairman of the District Committee has no objection to this amendment.

Mr. BABCOCK. No objection.

The amendment of Mr. RIXEY was agreed to.

The proposed new section, as amended, was then agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

Insert as section 13 the following:

"SEC. 13. That paragraphs 3 and 4 of section 8 of the act of Congress approved February 12, 1901, entitled "An act to provide for eliminating certain grade crossings of railroads in the District of Columbia, to require and authorize the construction of new terminals and tracks for the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in the city of Washington, and for other purposes," be, and they are hereby, amended so that they shall read as follows:

"'In consideration of the surrender by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, under the requirements of this act, of its rights under the several acts of Congress heretofore passed, and under its several contracts with the municipal authorities of the city of Washington authorized by said acts of Congress, and in consideration of the large expenditures required for the construction of the new terminals, viaduct, and connecting railroads, as required by this act, to avoid all grade crossings of streets and avenues within the city of Washington, and, further, in consideration of the grant and conveyance to the United States of the lands included within the limits of the roadway and right of way of the Washington Branch Railroad, which can be used for a street or avenue for the public benefit, the sum of $1,000,000, to be paid to said railroad company toward the cost of the construction of said elevated terminals, viaduct, and structures within the city of Washington, shall be, and is hereby, appropriated, one half to be paid out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the other half to be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia. The sum so appropriated shall be paid upon presentation of a certificate by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that the said viaduct has been completed as required by this act.

"'In order to provide for the one-half of said amount chargeable to the District of Columbia, the Commissioners thereof shall, on the 1st day of July following the passage of this act, and annually thereafter, pay over to the Treasurer of the United States, out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, the sum of $100,000, to be invested by the said Treasurer in interest-bearing bonds of the United States or the District of Columbia, until the full sum of $500,000, as provided herein, shall have been paid.'"

The amendment was agreed to.

The remainder of the bill was read, no further amendment being offered.

Mr. BABCOCK. I have another amendment which I wish to offer. It is designed simply to correct the name of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company so as to conform to the name of the present organization, which is "Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad."

The amendment of Mr. BABCOCK was read, as follows:

On page 1, line 3, after the word "the" insert "Philadelphia" and after the word "and" strike out the word "Potomac" and insert "Washington," and after the word "Company," on the same line, insert "(a corporation duly created by consolidation and merger of the Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company and the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, their respective capital stocks, railroad properties, and franchises)."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company" wherever they appear in said bill and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington Railroad Company."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 7, after the word "to," insert the "Baltimore and Potomac Railroad" and strike out "said last named."

On line 16 strike out the word "it" and insert the words "the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company."

On line 17, after the word "said," insert "Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington" and capitalize the words "railroad company."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of line 18, page 28, the following:

"That in order to meet the extraordinary expenses entailed by the provision of this act, the rate of taxation on the assessed real and personal property in the District of Columbia for each of the next five fiscal years is hereby increased 25 per cent."

Mr. MUDD. Mr. Chairman, on that I make the point of order.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland will state his point of order.

Mr. MUDD. The point of order is this: This is a bill to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia and "for other purposes." Now, the fact that the words "for other purposes" are included within the title does give the committee jurisdiction to consider any other proposition that anybody can imagine as a desirable subject for legislation at this time. No subject-matter can be incorporated in the bill unless it be along the line of the general purposes of a railroad station, or railroad tracks, or crossings.

Taxation is entirely foreign to the subject-matter of this legislation, and I think the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order. It might with just as much propriety be contended that we could impose a tariff upon certain foreign articles for the purpose of raising revenue in this same bill in order to meet the increased expenditure imposed by it upon the United States Treasury. It would be just as germane as this. Almost anything, any piece legislation in connection with the raising of revenues by taxation for the United States, as well as the District of Columbia, could be put in as amendment, if this amendment, as proposed by the gentleman from Illinois, is germane, because the United States Government contributes to the expense of this proposed improvement as well as the District of Columbia.

The fact that this bill provides for unusual expenditures and requires an unusual revenue to meet them does not alter the situation nor change the rule. If that were true an omnibus public building bill entailing heavy expenditures upon the General Government could be amended by including a horizontal increase in the tariff in its provisions.

The proposition submitted in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is upon an entirely different subject-matter than that embraced in the provisions of the bill. The amendment, therefore, is for that reason not merely obnoxious to the general principles of parliamentary law, but in direct contravention of clause 7 of Rule XVI of the rules of this House, which provides that "no motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment."

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the point of order, the Chair will notice, commencing with line 9, down to and inclusive of line 18, there is a provision which provides for the expenses of a part or all of this extraordinary legislation, namely:

In order to provide for the one-half of said amount chargeable to the District of Columbia, the Commissioners thereof shall, on the 1st day of July following the passage of this act and annually thereafter, pay over to the Treasurer of the United States out of the revenues of the District of Columbia the sum of $100,000, to be invested by said Treasurer in interest-bearing bonds of the United States or the District of Columbia until the full sum of $500,000, as provided herein, shall have been paid.

Now, then, there is a provision to care there for this extraordinary expense in part, and the casual reader would suppose that that is all there is of it. But there is confessed four millions of increase. That does not include, I find on examination, the highway bridge, which is an increase from half a million to, in round numbers, a million, and by this legislation——

Mr. BABCOCK. But, Mr. Chairman, this has nothing to do with the highway bridge.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes; this act adopts the burden of the terminal legislation now on the statute books, and adds to it, and the highway bridge was part and parcel of that terminal legislation.

Mr. BABCOCK. The gentleman will realize that a new bridge was an absolute necessity, to take the place of the Long Bridge, regardless of any legislation.

Mr. CANNON. I am not now speaking about the wisdom of this appropriation and of this legislation. I say that it seems to me that if it could be amended to include it or apt provision made for it, it was probably apt legislation. I made my point as best I could, and it did not meet the approval of the committee. I have always bowed to the majority—first, because I can not help myself, and second, because I frequently find the majority wiser than myself; but in the exercise of that wisdom we mark down, in round numbers, to a confessed five million, with an absolute deficit of half that sum upon the District, with no provision for it.

Now, it is honorable, it is good legislation, and, in my opinion, in connection with the lines I have just read, it is germane. As we have provided for this extraordinary expenditure, this provides the wherewith to pay it. Otherwise, it is germane to impose the expenditure, germane to provide for it in part, but out of order and immoral to provide for its payment. I think that it is apt, that it is honest, that it is germane.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word explanatory of this section. The gentleman and perhaps the committee are laboring under the impression that this is new legislation. This simply reenacts the present law. The present law provides for retiring $150,000 a year, instead of $100,000, and when we cut the appropriation of the District from $750,000 to $500,000 it was necessary to reenact this section and change the amount of the sinking fund from $150,000 a year to $100,000 a year. With that exception that is the law as it stands to-day on the statute book. And I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I do not and can not see where a tax proposition is germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. This is a bill to provide for a union railroad station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes. It is reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It provides for the establishment of a park in the District of Columbia and for the opening of streets, and imposes considerable expense upon the District of Columbia.

It also imposes some expense upon the Treasury of the United States. If, as has been suggested, an amendment were offered increasing the tariff upon imports to meet such charges the objection would at once be made that under the rules such a measure must be referred to a different committee—the Ways and Means. In other words, the rules of the House would make an amendment touching the tariff not germane to such a bill as this.

But with the District of Columbia the case is different. If the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois were offered as a separate measure, it would go, under the rules, to the same committee which has reported this bill. The District Committee has jurisdiction of revenues as well as expenditures, and could, without infringing any rule, include in one bill the purposes of the bill and also of the amendment. While not entirely clear from doubt, the Chair is of the opinion that the amendment providing revenue to meet the expenditures entailed by the provisions of the bill itself upon the District of Columbia is germane to the bill, and therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope this amendment will be defeated. The burdens imposed upon the District by the last act that passed this Congress have been heavy. Interests here are not yet adjusted to those burdens. If I were to take the time of the committee to-night and go into the details and facts, I could show that this was not necessary at all. Five years will elapse under this bill before these improvements are to be completed, and provision is made for a sinking fund of one-fifth of the amount per year. The fact is that under this bill the District appropriates or contributes for this purpose only $500,000 outside of damages and the changes in street grades, and that amount is fully provided for in that section.

Mr. CANNON. I just want to say a word. I was forced at the last session of Congress to have some familiarity with District revenues and District expenditures. We got into that condition where it was absolutely necessary to refrain from making certain needed improvements in this District that ran to the public health of its inhabitants, or to provide some additional revenue. Through great tribulation we finally provided some additional revenue, but not enough to care for your sanitary system of sewerage in front; not enough to care for proper water development in front; not enough to care for the expenditures of almost one-half of the $5,000,000 provided by this bill and legislation that is to be vitalized by this bill, because now they will begin.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman tell us how much is raised yearly by the increase in the tax on real estate and the tax on personal property?

Mr. CANNON. Well, as nearly as I can now recall, a large amount of the increase is based upon the increase in licenses to sell liquors, and the amount of the liquor license is not touched. It is quite high enough—I believe $800 now. But by the reassessment of the real estate and by a tax upon personal property—not as thorough as one could wish—my recollection is that the amount was increased so that the present revenues in round numbers would be about $4,000,000 from the real and personal property.

Mr. COWHERD. How much is that more than the revenues were last year?

Mr. CANNON. It is a little difficult to tell. Estimated exclusive of licenses it is in the neighborhood of eight hundred thousand or nine hundred thousand dollars—say, $800,000 increase. Now, the taxing law in the District on the amount of property that we reach is levied at 1½ per cent on two-thirds valuation; that is to say, property that is valued at 66 cents on the dollar pays a cent and a half on the two-thirds valuation. This amendment increases it, if adopted, 25 per cent. That would make a cent and three-quarters on the two-thirds valuation. It is not a large increase, and as nearly as I can tell on a hasty guess five years will be about sufficient to meet these extraordinary expenses and will still leave the Government of the United States called upon to advance from the Treasury, perhaps under some other taxing laws, the money necessary for the extraordinary expenditures for sanitary sewerage, water filtering, and the increase of water supply, as well as some other matters.

In other words, I am not antagonizing this legislation. I believe it should have been amended. It was not, but it is the sense of Congress to have it as it has been adopted. I am content, even with the refusal of the Committee of the Whole to amend it. I will follow the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] in saying that upon the whole I think this legislation is wise.

But let us march up, and while we pay one-half from the Treasury of all the people, aptly make the District property pay its one-half. It does two things. It makes them pay, without undue burden, that which they ought to pay; and it is less than your constituents and mine pay. That is number one. Now, number two. It serves notice upon them that when they agonize in the future, in season and out of season, for extraordinary expenses, that they can have, as I once before expressed, whatever they are willing to take and help pay for.

In other words, they can walk, trot, or run as fast as they bear their part of the burden. I do not mean to confiscate, but I mean to provide in this life for these expenses, recollecting that my constituents and yours bear far greater burdens than are proposed to be placed upon the real and personal property of this District in the next five years. I ask for a vote.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, just one word. If this amendment is adopted, that increases the taxes 25 per cent. Is that right?

Mr. CANNON. That is right.

Mr. BABCOCK. The tax yield is about $5,000,000—$5,100,000 or $5,200,000.

Mr. CANNON. That includes the extraordinary tax that is put upon the poor saloon keepers, when we put their license at $800; and this provision does not put any more on the saloon keeper.

Mr. BABCOCK. It applies to all direct taxation on personal and real estate.

Mr. CANNON. But more money comes, as I am inclined to believe, from the license tax than comes from all the tax upon personal property.

Mr. BABCOCK. Then there will be raised over $5,000,000 in this period of five years—more than that—while the total expense to the District of Columbia of this whole improvement is something near $1,300,000—more than four times the total expense. I ask for a vote. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize a great deal with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois—that the District does not always bear a fair share of the burden, and that there is a great deal more laid upon the shoulders of our constituents than ought to be. But I do not sympathize with the proposition that seeks to increase the taxes of the District by an amendment of this bill. Taking the tax increase of last year, and the gentleman says that not counting the increase in saloon license this year's revenues are $800,000 more than last, or in all something near a million and a half, and this is a proposition to make an increase in this tax.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me, with all due deference to the gentleman from Illinois—who very frequently reads us a lecture in the House, and nearly always properly—it does not seem to me to lie in his mouth to criticise the expenditures in this bill, because only two years ago, or when these measures were up fixing then upon the District all the expenditures carried in this bill, except those on account of the plaza, the gentleman gave to that measure his consent and approval. This very bridge had been reported against at that time by the engineer officer of the Government of the United States, and some of us thought it ought to have been stricken out of the bill, but the gentleman from Illinois voted for it when the expenses were fixed upon the Government and the District two years ago; and it is a little too late, it seems to me, to bring a provision here, on the conclusion of this bill. It could have been brought in a year ago, when we changed the tax laws of the District; it might come as a separate measure from the Committee on the District of Columbia; but to bring it in here, and now, seems rather as a penalty against the House because we voted a while ago for the plaza. I think therefore, while I say I want the District to bear its fair share of the burden, I am inclined to think we ought to vote down the proposition to tack it upon this bill at this time.

Mr. CANNON. Just one word in reply to the gentleman. Yes; my recollection is that two years ago I voted for the legislation that is now upon the statute books, wisely or unwisely. I thought wisely at the time. I have given many votes here that it subsequently turned out were not wise. I have no pride of opinion. If I have sinned, then I am sorry for it. But since that time many things have happened, many great expenses have been provided for by Congress, and many more are necessary to provide for in the District of Columbia.

Now, upon the whole, I am content to follow the genleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] as to the wisdom of this legislation, notwithstanding the amendment I offered was voted down. There is nothing extraordinary about that. I expect that is about the two hundredth time I have been voted down on amendments. I always do the best I can. But here is the situation: It is easy to vote for expenditures. Already many hundred thousands of dollars have been advanced from the Treasury of the United States that are to be reimbursed from the revenues of the District, and when we take on these additional burdens we have got to either provide by this taxation or vote burdens without any provision in law for their payment. Now, then, let us have one hand wash the other. That is all I want.

The amendment was considered and rejected.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to correct the language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to go back and offer the following amendment to the bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 20, after the word "provide," insert the words "with respect to the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. OLMSTED, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration Senate bill 4825, known as the union station bill, and had instructed him to report the same back with sundry amendments thereto, with the recommendation that as amended the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will submit them to the House in gross.

The amendments were considered in gross, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

GREAT FALLS AND OLD DOMINION RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I want to call up House bill 10522, to provide for laying a single electric railway track across the Aqueduct Bridge in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon deposit of the amounts hereinafter stated by the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Virginia, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed to change or rebuild, according to such plans as they may approve, the superstructure of the Aqueduct Bridge across the Potomac River so as to permit the placing thereon of a single electric-railway track for the accommodation of electric cars operating and to operate across said bridge.

SEC. 2. That within thirty days after the approval of this act the said Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company shall deposit with the collector of taxes of the District of Columbia the sum of $1,000, and the said company shall, before the work provided for in the first section hereof shall be begun, deposit with said collector the additional sum of $24,000, the aggregate amount of said sums being the estimated cost of such change or alteration in said bridge necessary for the purpose of accommodating such street-railway traffic across same: Provided, That if the sum of $25,000 shall not have been deposited by said railroad company within twelve months after the passage of this act the said company shall forfeit to the said District of Columbia the said sum of $1,000, hereinbefore required to be deposited.

SEC. 3. That within sixty days after the sum of $25,000 shall have been deposited by said company, as hereinbefore required, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, as promptly as possible, proceed with the work of changing or rebuilding the superstructure of the said Aqueduct Bridge, charging the cost of said work to said deposit, and shall continue same until said work is completed: Provided, That if said sum is found at any time during the prosecution of said work to be insufficient to complete the same, in the opinion of said Commissioners, the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company shall deposit with the collector of taxes of said District such sum or sums, not to exceed $5,000, as the Commissioners of the District of Columbia may deem necessary.

SEC. 4. That within ninety days after the completion of the work of changing or rebuilding said bridge, or during the progress of said work, as may be directed by the said Commissioners, the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company is hereby authorized and directed, under such regulations and upon such plans as may be approved by said Commissioners, to lay upon said bridge and across M street and in Thirty-sixth street to such point south of Prospect street, in the city of Washington, as may be approved by said Commissioners, a single electric-railway track, with necessary switches and turn-outs; that the said Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company is hereby authorized to connect its tracks to be constructed over its right of way in Alexandria County, Va., with the track hereby authorized to be constructed upon the said Aqueduct Bridge, and to operate its cars thereon.

SEC. 5. That any other electric railway company desiring to use said track for the purpose of crossing said bridge and securing connection into the city of Washington may be permitted to do so by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia upon satisfying said Commissioners that it has refunded to said Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company such proportional part of the sum deposited by said company, as herein required, as may be agreed upon between said companies as a fair and equitable compensation for said privilege, and in the event that the said companies shall fail to agree upon the amount to be so refunded, either or any of them may apply by petition to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which shall immediately provide for proper notice to and hearing of all parties interested, and shall have power to determine the amount to be so refunded for the use of said track.

SEC. 6. That the company or companies using said track shall at all times keep the bridge floor and the pavement between the rails of said track and for a distance of 2 feet outside thereof in repair to the satisfaction of said Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and in the event that the said railway company or companies neglect or refuse to keep said floor and pavement in repair to the satisfaction of said Commissioners, the Commissioners are hereby authorized to make such repairs and collect the cost of the same from such railroad company or companies in such manner as is now provided by law in cases where street pavements adjacent to street railway tracks are repaired by said District; and if the cost of said repairs is not paid by said railroad company or companies within ninety days from the rendition of bills for the same, the said Commissioners are hereby authorized to prevent the operation of said cars by the exercise of their police authority until such time as said bills are paid.

SEC. 7. That no car shall be operated upon said bridge by steam power, nor shall any company operating steam cars within such distance from the south end of the said bridge as to interfere with vehicle traffic thereon be permitted to operate electric cars upon said bridge.

SEC. 8. That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to permit the cars of said railroad company or companies using said track across said bridge and in M and Thirty-sixth streets to be operated by the underground electric system or by overhead trolley, as they may deem desirable; and in case the overhead trolley is used each car shall be equipped with a double trolley, and a return wire shall be provided for the electric current equal in capacity to the feed system upon this portion of the line and similarly situated, and no pole of any dynamo furnishing power for the operation of said cars shall be in any manner connected with the earth.

SEC. 9. That the operation of the cars upon the track herein authorized shall be under the direction and control of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who are hereby authorized to make such regulations in regard to speed, character, and weight of cars, time of operation, and fare to be charged as they may deem necessary or desirable; and any company violating any regulations of said Commissioners made under the authority of this section shall be subject to a fine of not less than $25 for each and every offense, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction at the suit of said Commissioners, and in default of the payment of such fine the Commissioners are hereby authorized to exercise their police authority to prevent the operation of the cars of the company so defaulting.

SEC. 10. That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

With the following amendments recommended by the committee:

Amend the title by inserting, between the words "electric" and "railway," the word "street."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "electric," insert the word "street."

Page 2, line 13, strike out the period after the word "deposited" and add the following: "and all rights under this act."

Page 2, line 25, insert after the word "such" the word "additional."

Page 3, line 1, strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] to offer two amendments.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, on page 2, in line 13, I move to strike out the word "twelve" and insert the word "three." The effect of this amendment will be to require the railroad company to make its deposit in three months instead of twelve months.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

Mr. RIXEY. I now offer the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 2, after the word "act" in line 16, by adding the following: "Provided further, That if the said Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company shall fail to make said deposit of $1,000 within said thirty days, or the sum of $25,600 within said ninety days, then all rights of the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company under this act shall be forfeited; in which event the Washington, Arlington and Falls Church Railroad Company may, within ten days from the default made by the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company, make the said deposit or deposits, and have and enjoy all the rights, privileges, and franchises granted by this act to the Great Falls and Old Dominion Railroad Company."

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, the effect of this amendment is this: This bill gives the privilege to the Old Dominion road to lay its tracks across the Aqueduct Bridge, and provides that it must put up a deposit with the District Commissioners of $25,000. This amendment provides that if that company fails to make a deposit the Falls Church Railroad Company, which is now operating cars on the other side, may have the privileges given to the Old Dominion Company.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BABCOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ALLOTMENT OF LANDS TO INDIANS IN NEW YORK.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House bill 12270 as reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, together with the committee amendment thereto.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, on that motion I demand a second.

The bill with the proposed amendment was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That after the consent of a majority of the Indians hereinafter mentioned shall have been obtained to such allotment the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized to allot the lands upon the Allegany and Cattaraugus reservations, within the State of New York, in severalty to the Indians who are located on said reservations, or are entitled to share in such allotments, and in determining who shall be entitled to share in such allotment of land the rolls of the Seneca Nation of Indians (excluding the Tonawanda band), according to which annuity money is paid, shall be controlling, but any error in such rolls may be, for the purposes of allotment, corrected by the commission hereinafter appointed, such corrections to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 2. That for the purpose of making the allotment provided for in this act a commission of three men shall be appointed by the President (one of whom may be recommended to the President by the president of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians, provided such nomination be made within thirty days after the date of the approval of this act), the appointment of such commission to take effect and the duties of said commission to begin immediately after the consent of a majority of said Indians to said allotment has been obtained; and said commission shall make their final report as soon as practicable, and certainly within two years of their appointment, and all their functions as a commission shall cease and determine at the time of the submission of their final report. All allotments as made by said commission shall be certified by such commission to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs in duplicate, one copy to be retained in the office of the New York Indian agent and the other copy to be transmitted to the Secretary of the Interior for his action and to be deposited in the General Land Office.

It shall be the duty of said commission, in making said allotments, to appraise the value of all the lands upon said reservations which are not explicitly excepted from allotment in the succeeding sections of this act, but such first appraisement shall not include the value of buildings, orchards, or other improvements on such lands; and such lands shall be appraised in lots sufficiently small to secure a fair uniform valuation per acre in each lot thus appraised, and when the entire value of the land subject to allotment in said reservations shall thus have been appraised and estimated, said amount so estimated shall be divided by the number of Indians who are entitled to allotment at the date of allotment; and the result of such division shall be regarded as a "full share" or "unit of value" in the proposed allotting of lands; and each Indian shall be entitled to an allotment of land of the value of one such "full share." In assigning allotments to individual Indians each Indian shall, so far as practicable, receive the allotment upon which are situated the buildings and improvements now owned by such individual.

The area of the allotment made to any individual shall not be diminished in consequence of the value of any improvements thereon which belong to the allottee; but the area of an allotment to any individual shall be diminished in proportion to the value of any improvements thereon when such improvements did not at the time of allotment belong to the Indian to whom the land on which they stand is allotted. Whenever any individual Indian at the time of allotment holds and occupies any of the lands of said reservations which he has acquired by purchase, descent, or devise, in conformity with the laws and usages of his nation, he shall be reimbursed to the extent of the reasonable value of his improvements on and interest in all such land so belonging to him which shall not be allotted to him. The compensation to be made to any Indian as aforesaid for improvements on and interest in land theretofore held by but not allotted to him, as aforesaid, shall be assessed and determined by the commission appointed by the President to make such allotments, and shall be paid upon the certificate of such allotting commission by the Secretary of the Interior from any money in his hands derived under the provisions of section 4 of this act.

SEC. 3. That upon the approval of the allotments hereinbefore provided for by the Secretary of the Interior he shall cause allotment patents to issue therefor in the name of the allottees, and upon receipt of said patents of allotment each of said allottees shall be and become a citizen of the United States and amenable to the laws of the United States and of the State or Territory where he may then reside; and said patents of allotment shall declare and be of the legal effect that the United States does and will hold the lands thus allotted in trust for the sole use and benefit of the Indian to whom such allotment has been made or his heirs, according to the laws of the State of New York, for a period of twenty-five years, and that at the expiration of such period the United States will convey the same by patent to the said Indian or to his heirs as aforesaid, in fee, discharged of said trust and free of all charge and incumbrance whatsoever, and if any conveyance shall be made of the lands set apart and allotted as herein provided, or any contract made touching the same, before the expiration of the time above mentioned, such conveyance or contract shall be absolutely null and void: Provided, That in taking an allotment and becoming a citizen under the provisions of this act the right of any Indian to tribal or other property shall not thereby be affected or impaired: Provided further, That at any time after the expiration of one year after such allotments have been made the Secretary of the Interior, upon presentation of a certificate signed and acknowledged by the county judge, the surrogate, and the clerk of the county in which any such allottee may reside, stating that such allottee, in their knowledge and opinion, is temperate, industrious, competent to manage his affairs, and qualified for citizenship, may cause such patent in fee simple to issue at once to such allottee under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

SEC. 4. That none of the lands upon the Allegany Reservation within the limits of the villages of Vandalia, Carrollton, Great Valley, Salamanca, West Salamanca and Red House as surveyed and located pursuant to an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the Seneca Nation of New York Indians to lease lands upon the Cattaraugus and Allegany reservations and to confirm existing leases," approved February 19, 1875, and none of the lands of the Seneca Nation of New York Indians on the Cattaraugus or Allegany reservations outside of said villages which have been leased and are now legally held by the lessee or grantee thereof pursuant to authority of Congress (other than the lands leased for oil purposes) shall be allotted. Each lessee of such lands, his assigns or grantees, may pay a sum of money 4½ per cent of which equals the annual rental upon the lands so leased by him, and a further sum, bearing the same proportion to the $200,000 hereinafter specified as the area of the lands so leased by him bears to the total area of the lands to which the claim of the Ogden Land Company attaches on the Cattaraugus, Allegany, and Tuscarora reservations, to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of said Indians, and when such lessee, assignee, or grantee shall have fully paid said respective sums as herein provided the Secretary of the Interior shall cause a patent to issue vesting in such lessee, assignee, or grantee the full and absolute fee to the lands so leased by him, subject, however, to all valid liens and incumbrances existing thereon at the date of such patent.

That the lands now used and occupied by the Thomas Orphan Asylum on on the Cattaraugus Reservation, not to exceed 160 acres in area, and also the lands used and occupied by the Presbyterian Board of Missions, and the lands upon either of said reservations now used and occupied as cemeteries, church or schoolhouse sites, not exceeding 2 acres in area, respectively, shall not be subject to allotment under this act so long as such lands are actually used and occupied for said purpose.

That nothing in this act contained shall in any manner affect the payment of royalties or rents under any oil lease of lands upon either of said reservations, but such royalties shall continue to be paid the same as heretofore.

SEC. 5. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to retain from and out of the funds heretofore appropriated by Congress for the payment of the judgment of the Court of Claims, as finally determined by the Supreme Court in favor of the New York Indians against the United States, in case No. 17861 on the docket of said Court of Claims, the sum of $200,000 until the final determination of the action now pending in the supreme court of the State of New York, in which the said Seneca Nation of Indians is plaintiff, and Charles E. Appleby and others, defendants, and which said action is brought to determine the validity of the claim of the Ogden Land Company to the lands upon the Cattaraugus, Allegany, and Tuscarora reservations; and the Attorney-General of the United States is authorized and directed in behalf of the United States, as guardian of the Indians, to diligently prosecute the case to a final decision; and if it shall be finally adjudged and determined in said action that said Ogden Land Company, or the individuals composing such company, have a valid title to or vested interest in said lands, then the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and empowered to purchase in the name of the United States, in trust for the benefit of said Indians, as provided in this act, for a consideration not exceeding said $200,000, all the right, title, interest, claim, and demand of the said Ogden Land Company, and of the individuals composing the same, in and to the lands upon said reservations, and the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay, upon the requisition of the Secretary of the Interior, from said moneys so withheld, the amount of said purchase price, the same to be deducted from the portion of the said judgment belonging to the Seneca and Tuscarora Indians, in proportion of the area of the lands of their respective reservations to which the claim of the Ogden Land Company attaches.

The balance of said moneys so appropriated and now remaining for distribution, together with the balance of the moneys derived under section 4 of this act, not expended in accordance with section 1 hereof, shall be divided among the several beneficiaries thereof as soon after the passage of this act as the census or rolls of the New York Indians now being prepared by the Secretary of the Interior are completed and filed. And in case it shall be finally adjudged and determined in said action that the Ogden Land Company or the individuals composing the same have no valid title to or vested interest in said lands upon said reservations, then upon such final determination said $200,000 so withheld shall be distributed in the manner hereinbefore provided. The portion of such funds belonging to any Indian under the age of 21 years shall be paid to the general guardian of such Indian, duly appointed by the court having jurisdiction in the county where such minor resides, or to some legally qualified depository authorized by the laws of the State of New York to receive and hold in trust the funds of minors, the same to be accounted for upon the arrival of such Indian at the age of 21 years.

SEC. 6. That this act shall not take effect, except for the purpose of purchasing in the interest of the Indians the claim, title, and interest of the Ogden Land Company in and to such lands as above specified, and for distributing the money as provided in section 5, until such purchase has been consummated, but shall take effect in all respects directly after such purchase has been made.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask for a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. VREELAND. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

Mr. PERKINS. If an objection would prevent any action on this bill now, I wish to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] that a second be considered as ordered?

Mr. PERKINS. I make objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints as tellers on the question of ordering a second, the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 1.

Mr. PERKINS. I raise the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER (after counting the House). There are 157 members present—less than a quorum.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were (on a division (asked for by Mr. PERKINS)—ayes 48, noes 95.

Mr. PERKINS. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only 18 voting in favor thereof.

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will now close the doors, and the Sergeant-at-Arms is directed to bring in absent members. The Clerk will call the roll; and members present will vote as their names are called, or will answer "present."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 153, nays 29, answered "present" 13, not voting 160; as follows:

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I forgot for the moment that I was paired with Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I wish to withdraw my vote, having voted aye on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called Mr. DINSMORE'S name and he answered present.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 153, nays 29, present 13. A quorum has appeared, and the second is ordered. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a quorum is present, I desire to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, forty minutes' debate is in order, twenty minutes of which can be controlled by the gentleman from New York, Mr. VREELAND, and twenty minutes by the gentleman from New York, Mr. PERKINS.

Mr. PERKINS. I would state, Mr. Speaker, that I have no desire to waste time. I have very few suggestions which I wish to make in reference to the bill, and if the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] will take ten minutes, I will take ten minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York, Mr. PERKINS, at his request, will be allowed ten minutes, and ten minutes will be allowed to be controlled by the gentleman from New York, Mr. VREELAND, the time being shortened to twenty minutes instead of forty. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. VREELAND, is recognized.

Mr. VREELAND. Mr. Speaker, I will state briefly the purposes of the bill and then reserve the balance of my time. There are 5,000 Indians residing in the State of New York. They are living upon reservations under tribal relations, owning the lands in common. As everyone here knows, it has been the policy of the Government for the last twenty years to allot lands in severalty and thus put the Indians on the road toward becoming citizens of the United States. These Indians were not included in the Dawes bill, which passed about fifteen years ago, and under which about 70,000 Indians in the West have been allotted lands in severalty and thus put on the road to become citizens. This bill provides for allotment, making the land inalienable for a period of twenty-five years, except under certain conditions. The reason why these New York lands have remained unallotted for so many years is that there is a defect in the title to the lands. This bill provided, when it was introduced, that a sum of money, not out of the National Treasury, but out of the money coming to the Indians from the National Treasury, should be set aside to purchase and perfect this title so that allotment may follow.

The men who favor the bill believe that the courts have fully passed upon this question; but during the last few weeks an action has been brought in behalf of the Seneca Nation of Indians against this land company to quiet the title to their land. I have therefore proposed to the Committee on Indian Affairs an amendment directing that no money be paid to the land company until this suit shall have passed through the courts and reached its final conclusion.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. VREELAND. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Who instituted this suit?

Mr. VREELAND. The suit was instituted by some gentlemen residing in Rochester.

Mr. TAWNEY. Interested in the Ogden Land Company claim?

Mr. VREELAND. Oh, no; very strongly opposed to it. It was instituted in behalf of the Indians. They are the people who have opposed this claim.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the amount of the claim?

Mr. VREELAND. The amount which the Ogden Company has stood willing to take for the last twenty years is $200,000. The claim covers 56,000 acres. It is a claim for which the Ogden Land Company paid $30,000 for these reservations in 1810. Of course I have no interest whatever in the Ogden Land Company. I represent 8,000 people who live upon these reservations; who hold ninety-nine-year leases from these Indians, and who want to get a title to their lands. They are unable to do so while this cloud rests upon the title of the Indians. Allotment is impossible so long as this cloud rests upon the title. Now this suit has been started, which will at last go to the Supreme Court of the United States.

In order to insure that that suit shall go through to a conclusion, in order to insure that it shall not be used for the purpose of defeating legislation and be dropped after this Congress adjourns, we have provided in this amendment that the Attorney-General of the United States shall take charge of that suit, and he is instructed to push it forward to a conclusion in the higher courts. Then, if the Ogden Land Company has a legitimate claim, a vested interest in these lands, it will become apparent by the decisions of the courts, and may properly be paid. If the company has no interest in these lands, then allotment can go on and these Indians can be put upon the road to become citizens of the United States.

Mr. PARKER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether the Indians want to have this bill passed and want to have allotment?

Mr. VREELAND. A majority of the Indians are in favor of allotment. Nearly all of them are opposed to payment to the Ogden Land Company of any money, because they have been taught to believe that they do not owe the Ogden Land Company anything. With that claim out of the way, I will say to the gentleman that I think a majority of these Indians are in favor of allotment. The president of the Indian nation, who was elected last month, is in favor of allotment.

No bill before this House has received more careful consideration from those interested in Indian affairs than this bill which is now before the House. It is unanimously reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has received the approval of the Board of Indian Commissioners. It has received the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Last October, at Lake Mohonk, at the Twentieth Annual Conference of the Friends of the Indians, more than 300 of those who were interested in their affairs, from all over the United States, after a long discussion of this matter by those who favored it and those who opposed it, decided by unanimous vote that this bill ought to pass. I have a copy of their resolution here.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I have only very few words to say in reference to this bill.

I should say, first, that so far as I have opposed the consideration of the bill at this time, it was for a reason which, if it had been known to the House, I think would have excited the approval of the members. This bill affects a tribe of Indians in the northern part of the State of New York. There are many items in the bill to which, as I understand, they are opposed. The member of the House most familiar with their case is the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HENRY C. SMITH]. That gentleman spoke to me on Saturday and said he hoped the bill would not be taken up to-day, and asked if I could in any way prevent its being taken up, in order that he might be heard on the merits on many questions of detail in reference to the bill.

I regret to say that the bill has been taken up, and so far as I am concerned, I am not familiar with the items of detail which, as I understand, are unsatisfactory to some members of the tribe. I shall therefore confine my remarks to one or two statements in reference to the claim of the Ogden Land Company, and I will say to the gentleman in charge of the bill, as I have said already, that so far as I am concerned, if one or two amendments could be agreed to, I should not personally oppose the passage of the bill as it is now before the House.

As it was first before the House, Mr. Speaker, this bill, I say with great deference to my friend on the other side, I think was unfair. Over one hundred years ago the State of Massachusetts granted to three or four persons, who went by the name of the Ogden Land Company, this right, the right to buy of this tribe of Indians their lands when they should want to sell. Now there is a dispute in reference to the right that grew out of this. I do not intend to discuss the legal question before this House; but I say this, and there is not one lawyer in the House or one man in the House who can not see the force of this objection. What was the grant given the Ogden Land Company? The first right to buy the land. What was the price stated? No price was stated. No price having been stated, they have the right to buy the land of the Indians at the price the Indians see fit to take.

Now, this bill as first drawn was for the extinction of these rights, and to be paid out of the money belonging to these Indians, and for this grant of more than a century ago they were allowed $200,000, about one-third of the value of the lands allotted, as is stated in the report. This was to be paid to the Ogden Land Company by the Indians, on what sort of a contract? If I make a contract to buy a piece of land for a thousand dollars, worth fifteen hundred, and the contract is not carried out, I have the right to the $500 difference. If I make a contract with my friend from New York to buy a piece of land at a price he shall ask for it, then at the time that he exercises the option he will ask for the land all it is worth, and if I refuse, the damages which I will recover must be nominal. And so I say to my friend from Cattaraugus that when Congress says that $200,000 of the money belonging to these Indians should be taken and paid to these people, who a hundred years ago had a contract the validity of which is questioned, this was not a proper thing to ingraft on this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should say, in fairness to the gentleman from Cattaraugus, that so far as the objection I raised to the bill it was only in reference to the Ogden land claim, because as to the rest of the bill I am not familiar with the subject. I am not familiar with the allotment of land among Indians. I do not know whether it is right or wrong. I can not say it is wrong, because the facts are not within my knowledge. But this I do say: Provision has now been made by an amendment offered by which it is provided that the right of the Ogden Land Company shall be submitted to the courts. An action has already been brought, and if the courts shall determine in their favor the Secretary of the Treasury is then authorized to pay this amount, if it is held the company have a valid claim to the land. That provision has been faultily drawn and could be amended by one or two slight changes, which I hope my friend can see his way to agree to. I have no desire to interpose any factious opposition to the bill.

Mr. VREELAND. I will ask my friend what his amendment is?

Mr. PERKINS. The bill provides that if it shall be held that this Ogden Land Company had a valid right and title or a vested interest in the land then the title shall be extinguished. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it may be well to recollect this. That is all the Ogden Land Company has, and if I were the counsel I would say that all they could have was this contract to purchase at a price not stated, and we all of us know that the first essence of a contract is that the price shall be stated. So I think that if the Ogden Land Company had any right they would only be entitled to nominal damages. At all events it can do no harm to provide for that contingency, and I have drawn this amendment to insert after the words "vested interests in said lands," and before "then," the words "or is entitled to recover damages as for a breach of contract for the purchase of such lands." And after "upon said reservations" insert "or the amount which may be awarded for damages for a breach of contract to sell." I believe, Mr. Chairman, if that amendment were put in the bill it would be acceptable.

Mr. VREELAND. Will my friend permit me to interrupt him? I will say that I have no objection to this amendment whatever. The people for whom I am interested are not in favor of the Ogden Land Company. They have already had to pay $20,000 out, and they are not willing to have more paid out.

The SPEAKER. This can only be done by unanimous consent. Is it the request of the gentleman from New York that this bill be amended by the amendment which the gentleman has just read?

Mr. VREELAND. I consent to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the amendment which has just been read be incorporated in the motion. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask that it be reported. I could not hear.

The Clerk read as follows:

After "vested interests in said lands," and before "then," insert "or is entitled to recover damages as for a breach of contract for the purchase of such lands;" and after "upon said reservations" insert "or the amount which may be awarded for damages for a breach of contract to sell."

The SPEAKER. The question is whether, by unanimous consent, these amendments shall be considered as pending in the bill with the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND].

Mr. LACEY. I think, Mr. Speaker, there ought to be some amendment there by which Congress shall not waive the statute of limitations.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think there can be no question of the statute of limitations. If there is any validity in this contract the claim for damages can only begin to run when the Indians offer the land for sale. They have never done it down to this time, and there is no question of the statute of limitations in this case.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and these amendments will be considered pending.

Mr. PERKINS. One further amendment, Mr. Speaker. The bill provides that if there is an award made to the Ogden Land Company, which may be for $200,000, certain people who hold leases—I understand a portion of the Indian land has been leased in some village in Cattaraugus County?

Mr. VREELAND. There are six villages under lease of ninety-nine years.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] has expired. The gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND] has seven minutes remaining.

Mr. VREELAND. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] three minutes more.

Mr. PERKINS. The bill as it is now presented provides that if it is held that the Ogden Land Company had any claim, then the people holding the land under lease shall contribute toward that in proportion to the size of the pieces of land they hold. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that that provision is not right, because the proportion of size will be almost nothing. Here are village lots that contain a quarter of an acre, and they pay only in proportion to their size in comparison with a farm, say, of 10 or 20 acres.

Mr. HOPKINS. What is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. PERKINS. I propose that the word "size" be stricken out and the word "value" inserted.

Mr. VREELAND. I want to say to my friend from New York that if he were familiar with the condition of affairs there, which it would take too long for me to state at this hour, he would not ask for that amendment. These lots already pay a rental to the Indians on the basis of value. By adopting this amendment it would make them pay both ways on the basis of value. For instance, if a man pays $10 a year rent at present, he would have to pay two or three hundred dollars because of his lease. Now, he should not be charged again with the value of it to pay the Ogden land claim, which covers all of the land.

As a matter of fact, a concession has been made by the people in the villages to pay any part of it. It was considered a great concession to pay the $20,000 they have to pay under this bill, because they are capitalizing the rents and paying the Indians all the value they have in it.

Mr. PERKINS. How do they pay $20,000?

Mr. VREELAND. They pay their proportion of the Ogden claim on the land they occupy and about $180,000 to the Indians on the capitalization of the rents.

Mr. VREELAND. They are made to pay the same as the rest of the reservation.

Mr. PERKINS. I am willing that it should be the value of the land, excluding any improvement which they have put upon it—that the buildings which have been added should be excluded—but certainly it should be the value of the land.

Mr. VREELAND. The value of it when?

Mr. PERKINS. To-day.

Mr. VREELAND. How can you separate the value of the lot from the brick building that is on it?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, that is perfectly easy to do. Millions of dollars' worth of buildings are now upon leased land that pays ground rent. That is perfectly easy.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] has expired.

Mr. VREELAND. I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE].

Mr. LITTLE. I yield one minute of that time to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when this bill came from the committee I was opposed to it. I intended to offer some such amendment as was offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS]. The conditions in regard to these lands are such that something should be done to right them by Congress. The best legal minds in New York differ in regard to this question. The amendment put in the bill provides for an action brought on behalf of the Indians by a former member of this House, who opposes this claim, shall be prosecuted to completion, and if the company is held to have a good claim they shall be paid for it. In my opinion, the amount stated in the bill will be a very reasonable compensation for the claim if it be good. Under all the circumstances, I think the bill in its present shape is the best bill the Indians will ever be able to get through Congress. I think it will be for their interest and for the interest of the State.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, originally I opposed this bill, and I continued to oppose it until provision was made for litigation to determine the title of the Ogden Land Company. Although somewhat lonesome in my position, I did not believe the title of this company to be valid, and was not willing that the claim should be paid without a judicial determination of the question. But believing, as I do, that this litigation, instituted by the Indians themselves through their counsel and with the assistance of the Attorney-General, as provided in the bill, will determine that question, I assent to this measure.

If this litigation be determined in favor of the company, the title ought to be cleared, and the lands ought to be allotted to the people on the Indian reservation. The other parts of the bill I favor. I believe the land ought to be divided among the Indians, so that these, like other Indians of the country, may be put at least on the road to citizenship.

Mr. KEHOE. Has the gentleman any objection to this amendment?

Mr. LITTLE. I see no objection to it at all. Anything that will test absolutely the title of the Ogden Land Company before any payment be made meets my approval.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with the amendments reported by the committee, the amendment reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. VREELAND], and that which has been agreed to on the floor of the House, upon the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS].

The question was put.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, two-thirds have voted in the affirmative; the rules are suspended, and the bill as amended is passed.

KILLING OF ITALIAN SUBJECTS AT ERWIN, MISS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read:

To the Congress:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in regard to the killing, on July 11, 1901, by an armed mob at Erwin, Miss., of Giovanni and Vincenzo Serio and the wounding by the same mob of Salvatore Liberto, all subjects of the King of Italy, and recommend that, as an act of grace and without reference to the question of the liability of the United States, Congress make suitable provision for the heirs of the two Italian subjects killed and for the survivor, Salvatore Liberto, who was injured, the proceeds to be distributed by the Italian Government in such manner as it may deem proper.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, December 15, 1902.

The SPEAKER. This message, with the accompanying papers, will be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HITT. This document, I think, would, by ordinary usage, go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, but he would be glad to hear any suggestion from the gentleman on that point.

Mr. HITT. My only suggestion is that claims of this kind have usually been sent by the Secretary of State to our committee, to be incorporated in the annual appropriation bill or otherwise disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has had that matter investigated, and is advised that claims of this character have usually gone to the Committee on Appropriations. But it is within the province of the gentleman from Illinois to move a reference to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Does the gentleman make that motion?

Mr. HITT. No, sir; I will not make any motion.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PATTERSON of Pennsylvania, for one day, on account of important business.

To Mr. GLENN, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. PATTERSON of Tennessee, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. BREAZEALE, for five days, on account of important business.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Indian Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles, and the same were referred to the Committee on War Claims:

A bill (S. 586) for the relief of Frank C. Darling; and

A bill (S. 587) for the relief of A. M. Darling, administrator.

EXPENSES OF COAL STRIKE COMMISSION.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to call up from the Speaker's table the bill, passed by the House some days ago, to compensate the strike arbitrators. The bill has been returned from the Senate with amendments. I desire to move nonconcurrence in the amendments and to ask for a conference.

The amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners, were read.

Mr. CANNON. I move that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate, and ask for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON as conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the conclusions of fact and law in the French spoliation cases relating to the brig William and George, Josiah Benton, master, against The United States—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the assistant treasurer at Baltimore submitting an estimate of appropriation for increased force in his office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting an estimate of appropriation for fuel, oil, etc.—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Ordnance, a statement of the cost of guns and other articles manufactured by the Government—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. OVERSTREET, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 149) to provide for holding terms of court in the district of Utah, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2864); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Claims was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4270) for the relief of Gideon Holton, and the same was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SHERMAN: A bill (H. R. 16059) to provide for the greater protection of human life in the Government Hospital for the Insane and the better security of its buildings and the contents thereof against destruction or injury by fire—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. McRAE: A bill (H. R. 16060) for the protection of the public forest reserves and national parks of the United States—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. OVERSTREET: A bill (H. R. 16061) to increase the limit of cost for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Indianapolis, Ind.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. McRAE: A bill (H. R. 16062) to provide for the sale of the timber and other material growing or being on public forest reserves and for renting or leasing of the lands therein—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. JOY: A bill (H. R. 16063) to punish frauds at elections of Representatives and Delegates in Congress and of electors for President and Vice-President, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Election of President, Vice-President, and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. DE ARMOND: A bill (H. R. 16064) to raise revenue by taxing trust and other monopoly goods, wares, and merchandise at the same rate as if they were imported, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

Also, a bill (H. R. 16065) to apply bankruptcy legislation to the trust evils, and for other purposes—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. F. L. DAY, Ph. D., of the city of Washington.

Mr. WILLIAM A. CLARK, a Senator from the State of Montana, appeared in his seat to-day.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. KEAN, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

RECEIPTS AND EXPENDITURES IN CUBA AND THE PHILIPPINES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, December 12, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to invite attention to the act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902, and for prior years, and for other purposes," approved July 1, 1902, and contained in Public Document No. 217, which is, in part, as follows:

"Statement of receipts and expenditures in Cuba and the Philippine Islands: To enable the Secretary of War to employ temporary force and to pay all necessary expenses, including rent of rooms, not to exceed $1,500 in compiling for the information of Congress a detailed statement of the receipts and expenditures by the military government of Cuba since May 1, 1900, in continuation and completion of the statement heretofore furnished of such receipts and expenditures covering the period from the beginning of American occupation to and including April 30, 1900; and to enable the Secretary of War to pay all necessary expenses in compiling, for the information of Congress, a similar statement relating to the Philippine Islands of all receipts and expenditures from the date of American occupation, $30,000, or so much thereof as may necessary, to be available until expended."

In pursuance of said act the work of preparing the statements called for therein has been undertaken, and there are forwarded to you this day under separate cover four packages, as follows:

Package No. 1 contains detailed statements of revenues and expenditures in Cuba during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1901, comprising 4,146 pages.

Package No. 2 contains detailed statements of revenues and expenditures in Cuba for the period from July 1, 1901, to May 19, 1902, comprising 4,037 pages.

Package No. 3 contains detailed statements of expenditures in Cuba in the months of May and June, 1900, heretofore reported in totals only, comprising 169 pages. (For former report see Senate Document No. 448, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.)

Package No. 4 contains detailed statements of expenditures made by Gen. Charles F. Humphrey and other officers, from funds advanced by the United States from Army appropriations, for barracks and quarters for the fiscal year 1900, which expenditures were charged against the revenues of Cuba by Executive order of July 11, 1899, and an amount equaling the total sums expended refunded by the Government of Cuba to the United States Government. This report comprises 14 pages.

Other statements, now in course of preparation, will be forwarded as rapidly as it is possible to complete them. These statements will include expenditures subsequent to May 19, 1902, out of an appropriation of $100,000, retained from Cuban revenues, now being disbursed under direction of Brig. Gen. Leonard Wood, for settlement of the cost of preparing and printing the final official reports as well as certain accounts pertaining to the late military government of Cuba by the United States.

Statements of revenues and expenditures in the Philippine Archipelago from the date of occupation to the present time are in course of preparation, and will be transmitted when the tabulation is completed.

Very respectfully,

ELIHU ROOT,
Secretary of War.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the communication will be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and printed.

Mr. ALLISON. The exhibits seem to be very voluminous.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa? The Chair thinks that the accompanying papers also contain some items touching expenditures in the Philippines.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I suggest that the matter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and if it is desirable to print it, let it be printed with their recommendation. I observed casually as it was read at the desk that there is one document of 1,440 pages accompanying the communication. I suggest that the question of printing be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I understand that the matter contains a detailed statement of the expenditures and receipts in Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. ALLISON. That certainly must be a very voluminous document and the question whether it ought to be printed, it seems to me, should be submitted to some committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It also states that further communications and further statements will be made in relation to Cuba and in relation to the Philippine Archipelago. The question in the mind of the Chair is whether it should not go to the Committee on Printing and perhaps remain there until the further intelligence has been received.

Mr. ALLISON. I think that would be a wise course.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber, but I think I know what has been sent to the Senate. It will be remembered that some portion of the expenditures in Cuba has been printed by the Committee on Relations with Cuba for the use of the committee. There has been no general print. There are five large volumes, I think, that have been printed and distributed to members of the Senate. I believe a very proper disposition of the matter is to refer it to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, I am in harmony with the suggestion of the President of the Senate, that it be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and let that committee determine whether it is worth printing or not. It seems to me that would be the wiser course, unless we want to have the whole of the matter printed without reference to the value or the cost of it.

Mr. ALLISON. As I gather the purport of the letter, it is a recommendation for a deficiency; and then it gives with some detail the kind and character of work that is being done. If a deficiency appropriation is necessary, that is one question; but the question whether it is necessary to print all the receipts and expenditures of Cuba in detail is quite another matter, and it ought to be considered by the committee of which the Senator from Connecticut is chairman.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I think the Committee on Relations with Cuba now has a large mass of this work in the committee room, with which we have done nothing, because we did not know what to do about it.

Mr. CULLOM. I think a reference to the Senator's committee is the best course.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I have no objection to its reference to the Committee on Relations with Cuba to make recommendation as to what should be done.

Mr. ALLISON. If the immediate object of the communication is to secure an emergency appropriation, as I inferred from listening, as well as I could, to what was read at the desk, perhaps it should go to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is rather an explanation of expenditures under an appropriation in the deficiency act which was passed at the last session of Congress, and not a request for a deficiency now.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; but I know these voluminous documents should not be printed without the sanction of some one of the committees having charge of the subject.

Mr. CULLOM. If it is in order I will move that the communication and all of the accompanying papers shall be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication from the Secretary of War will be printed and referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba, and the accompanying papers will be referred to the Committee on Relations with Cuba without any order to print.

ALVA C. LAKE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a certified copy of the findings filed by the court in the cause of Alva C. Lake, executor of Daniel Lake, deceased, v. The United States; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 257) to establish a light-house and fog-signal station at Mukilto Point, near the city of Everett, State of Washington.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10522) to provide for the laying of a single electric track across the Aqueduct Bridge in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. CANNON, Mr. BARNEY, and Mr. LIVINGSTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Worcester, Mass., and a petition of the Merchants'

Association of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the appointment of a permanent national tariff commission; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to open the Territory of Alaska to settlement and the mineral wealth of that district to the industry of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide an educational test for immigrants to this country; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Evanstown, Ill., remonstrating against the admission into the Union of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico unless there is a restriction against the practice of polygamy; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of C. E. Nichols & Co., of Lowell, Ind., and a petition of the Commercial Club of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FRYE presented a memorial of the New York Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, remonstrating against the restoration of the Army canteen; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the New York Preachers' Meeting of the Methodist Episcopal Church, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict illiterate immigration, and also for the suppression of liquor selling in United States immigrant stations; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A bill (H. R. 11893) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia A. Dennis; and

A bill (H. R. 13449) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. E. Scott.

BUST OF LATE PRESIDENT M'KINLEY.

Mr. WETMORE. I am directed by the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 131) to purchase a bronze portrait bust of the late President McKinley from Mrs. Emma Cadwallader-Guild, to report it with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the joint resolution; and, by unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment of the Committee on the Library was, at the beginning of the joint resolution, to strike out the words "That a sufficient sum, as may be necessary, at their discretion" and to insert in lieu thereof "That the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

That the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Joint Committee on the Library to purchase from Mrs. Emma Cadwallader-Guild her bronze portrait bust of the late President McKinley.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INCREASED PENSIONS FOR LOSS OF LIMBS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on the 19th day of April last the Senate passed Senate bill 4850, the title of which is "To increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same." The bill went to the other House and was amended in many important particulars and returned to the Senate, and upon my motion it was recommitted to the committee. The committee has been deluged with letters concerning the bill, some of which have not been overrespectful, but the committee is still of opinion that the bill ought to be passed in some form.

I am directed by the committee to report back the bill to the Senate, and I move that the Senate nonconcur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing, to report it back and recommend that the amendment be concurred in. I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The Secretary read the amendment of the House of Representatives, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the first and tenth paragraphs of the printing act of January 12, 1895, following the paragraph which reads 'The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows and shall furnish gratuitously no others in addition thereto' be amended by striking out of said first paragraph the words 'forty-four' between the word 'Senator' and 'copies' in the first line and insert in lieu thereof the words 'eighty-eight;' and by striking out the word 'thirty' between the words 'Delegate' and 'copies' in the fourth line of said first paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the word 'sixty;' and by inserting in the ninth line of said first paragraph after the word 'copies' and before the word 'to' the following: 'and to the Clerk for the use of members of the House of Representatives 50 copies.' And amend said tenth paragraph by inserting in the third line thereof between the words 'Museum' and 'one' the words, 'the Department of Labor and Civil Service Commission' and further amend said tenth paragraph by striking out in the second line the word 'and' between the words 'Institution' and 'the.'"

Mr. PLATT of New York. It doubles the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD distributed to members of the Senate and House.

Mr. COCKRELL. Now let the bill be read as it would stand if the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. PLATT of New York. It doubles the number of copies that are to be furnished to Senators and members of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the bill as it would read as the committee propose to amend it.

The SECRETARY. The first paragraph referred to, if amended, would read as follows:

The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows, and shall furnish gratuitously no others in addition thereto:

To the Vice-President and each Senator, 88 copies; and to the Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, each 20 copies; and to the Secretary for office use, 10 copies; to each Representative and Delegate, 60 copies, of which number 8 copies shall be sent by the superintendent of documents, 1 each to such public or school libraries other than designated depositories as shall be designated for this purpose by each Representative and Delegate in Congress; and to the Clerk and Doorkeeper of the House, each 20 copies; and to the Clerk for office use, 10 copies; and to the Clerk for the use of members of the House of Representatives, 50 copies, to be supplied daily as originally published or in the revised and permanent form bound only in half Russia, or part in each form, as each may elect.

The tenth paragraph, if amended, would read as follows:

To the library of each of the eight Executive Departments, and to the Naval Observatory, Smithsonian Institution, the United States National Museum, the Department of Labor, and Civil Service Commission, 1 bound copy.

Mr. HALE. There is so much confusion in the Chamber it is impossible to hear. What is the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will please be in order. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing? It is a bill practically doubling the number of copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD given to each Senator and to each member of the House.

Mr. HALE. There was so much noise in the Chamber that I could not tell from the reading what the bill contained. I wanted to have the Senator from New York state to the Senate just what the bill comprehends. If, as the Chair has indicated, that is all, I have no further objection.

Mr. PLATT of New York. That is what I stated, and I repeat that it doubles the number.

Mr. HALE. None of us heard it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to make one inquiry of the Senator from New York. Does the bill change the number of copies which are furnished to the Senate for the use of Senators? I believe it is 10 copies now, under the law. Does it change that?

Mr. PLATT of New York. It doubles the present number, which is 44.

Mr. HALE. I thought from the reading there was something read which indicated that there were 10 copies given to the Senate.

Mr. PLATT of New York. It doubles the number to 88.

Mr. COCKRELL. But there is a certain number furnished here to the officers of the Senate for the convenience of the Senate. The question is whether that is stricken out, or whether it remains, or whether the number is increased. It ought not to be stricken out; that is all.

Mr. PLATT of New York. It is an increase and not a decrease. I can not explain it any further than that it doubles the number of copies given at present to Senators and Members.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to say even a word about the bill, but I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Printing to a matter that I have adverted to twice before, and that is the irregular order in which the Printing Office prints the post-office nominations sent to the Senate. They ought to be printed according to the State, in alphabetical order. It is not exactly agreeable to a Senator to be compelled to examine every single post-office nomination sent to the Senate in order to see those in his own State. Under the present practice a nomination for Texas may be either above or below the nomination for New York. I have absolutely no interest in the post-office nominations for New York, nor has the Senator from New York any interest in the post-office nominations for Texas. It ought to be easy for any Senator by a glance at the RECORD to see all the nominations relating to his own State. That is the end of his interest.

This, of course, is not a matter for legislation. It is merely a matter of regular and orderly printing of the nominations in the RECORD.

Mr. BLACKBURN. And all the nominations for the same State are not printed in succession.

Mr. BAILEY. As the Senator from Kentucky very properly says, all the nominations for the same State are not always printed in succession. It is so easy for the Public Printer to do that, I suggest to the chairman of the Committee on Printing that he take it up with the Public Printer.

Mr. ALLISON. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas is a very good one. The confirmations or nominations for all the States should be alphabetically arranged.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I merely rose to inquire whether this particular thing which we all agree ought to be done is in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing, or is it in the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rules? As I understand it, the Printer merely prints the copy as furnished by the reporters and by the clerks, and whoever has jurisdiction over those who have charge of the preparation of the copy for the Printer, the committee or the authority of this body, can merely extend the order. It is not under the jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing, I am sure, because it is simply to prepare the copy for the Printer in such a way that the nominations from each State shall be in alphabetical order, so that a man can find out as soon as he looks at the RECORD what nominations from his State have been sent in here or what confirmations have been made; that is all. They are now all higgledy-piggledy, heads and tails, all mixed up together.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. TILLMAN. I was through, but I shall be glad to get any information.

Mr. HOAR. I merely desire to say that my understanding has been that the Public Printer exercises all his duties under the general superintendence of the Committee on Printing, so far as they relate to the printing for the use of either of the two Houses. It is a joint committee, and any matter of the kind mentioned by the Senator from Texas suggested privately to the chairman of the Committee on Printing would receive undoubtedly the approval of that committee, and they would see that it was done. It does not require any order of the Senate at all as to the order in which the RECORD is printed, unless we choose to make a special order. I have no doubt that all that is necessary is the suggestion made in private. I have known of such suggestions made in private occasionally to the committee, and they have been carried out.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if the Senator from South Carolina will permit me, that I had no thought myself of proposing any order of the Senate. I simply made the statement in open Senate, and in the way of a suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Printing, to have this printing done in the mode precisely that the Senator says is the proper way.

While on my feet, I will say to the Senator from South Carolina that no matter what the order might be in which the clerks of the Senate furnish the list of nominations or confirmations to the Public Printer, the list might go into the hands of different printers, being divided there among a number, and the different printers might have their matter ready for the press in a different order, and therefore the order in which the clerks furnished the names to the Printing Office would not secure the order which we all desire. The only way to do it is at the Printing Office, and I take it that all that is necessary in order to secure the change is this open suggestion to the chairman of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, in view of the long service of my distinguished colleagues from Massachusetts and Texas, I presume to throw out an idea of my own here with great diffidence.

I still insist that the copy for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is officially furnished the Printer by the clerks and the reporters of the Senate, and that the Public Printer has no authority or right to alter or change or transpose anything sent him by these officials. Therefore the jurisdiction of the Committee on Printing does not extend to ordering the Printer to change the copy as sent him.

Now, I may be right or I may be wrong. We are disagreeing here more about form than about substance. Of course it is a question merely for somebody to extend this suggestion or instruction, whatever it may be called, to the clerks who prepare the copy. No doubt they will be very glad to accommodate Senators and arrange these matters to our satisfaction, for our quick comprehension of what we are interested in.

But I still stick to my position that it is not the Committee on Printing who have this matter in hand. The Public Printer is not to blame, nor can any trouble arise from the piecing out of copy to different compositors, as I happen to know, for I have been there to get speeches of my own, which I was anxious to revise. I have once or twice been in the Government Printing Office way after midnight, and I know that, when there is a rush, while the foreman cuts off slices, so to speak, of the copy furnished him, those slices always come back into the place where they belong, and there is no mixture there.

I thought it was nothing but right that the Public Printer should be absolved from any blame in this matter. And there is no blame anywhere, so far as I can see. It is merely a question as to where rests the authority and who is to be the one responsible for giving this order.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment. On the contrary, I am in favor of it; but I wish to say one word in connection with the matter of the distribution of the RECORD. I think this amendment of course is in the right direction, as anything is in that direction, in my opinion, which tends to more generally distribute the RECORD among the people. But even this is entirely inadequate to the needs. The RECORD is something which, by reason of the high price put upon it, is entirely out of the reach of the people of the United States. So far as the distribution is concerned, it amounts to very little. For instance, even under this increased number the great State of New York, probably with six or seven million people, will get only about 3,000 copies, which amounts to nothing; and the State of Georgia, with two and one-half million people, will get only somewhere between 1,000 and 2,000 copies.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Now, if the Senator will pardon me just a moment, I will state my only object in rising. At the last session of Congress I introduced a resolution which instructed the Committee on Printing to examine and report to the Senate the feasibility of putting down the price of the RECORD to such a low rate that it will be practicable for people generally to subscribe for it. The present price is absolutely prohibitory to the large mass of the people of the United States.

I recognize, Mr. President, that at the present short session it is impossible to bring this matter properly before the attention of Congress. I only desire to remind the honorable chairman of the Committee on Printing that there is before his committee that resolution which has never been reported back to the Senate, and to express the hope that if it is impracticable at the present session, at the next session it will be practicable for the Committee on Printing to take up and examine and report to the Senate what may be practicable in the way of putting the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at a price which will place it within the reach of the general reading public.

Mr. SPOONER. Only a word, Mr. President. I call the attention of my friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], bearing on the question of jurisdiction which he raised, to section 13 of the Standing Orders of the Senate in relation to the Joint Committee on Printing, which provides as follows:

SEC. 13. The joint committee shall have control of the arrangement and style of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and while providing that it shall be substantially a verbatim report of proceedings, shall take all needed action for the reduction of unnecessary bulk, etc.

The whole jurisdiction is given by the rule to that committee. The suggestion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] is therefore properly made, and I suppose it will be taken into consideration by the Committee on Printing. It is for them to determine.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I notice one omission. Under the existing law 10 copies are furnished to the Senate; so that if a Senator has a request for a copy of the RECORD containing a speech or some other matter that his constituents may be interested in the officials of the Senate can usually furnish that copy out of the 10 copies that they have at their disposal. Inadvertently that has been omitted, and I move to amend by inserting:

To the Sergeant-at-Arms, for the use of the Senate, 20 copies.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I accept that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to the amendment of the House of Representatives will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment by adding:

To the Sergeant-at-Arms, for the use of the Senate, 20 copies.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. NELSON. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6461) providing for an additional district judge in the district of Minnesota, to report it favorably without amendment. I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. QUARLES introduced a bill (S. 6600) to amend an act entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraint and monopolies," approved July 2, 1890; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 6619) granting an increase of pension to John W. Miller; and

A bill (S. 6620) granting an increase of pension to Richard R. Robinson.

Mr. SCOTT introduced a bill (S. 6621) granting a pension to George W. Arnold; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6622) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States," approved January 16, 1883, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 6623) granting an increase of pension to Gilbert E. Bushnell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6624) granting an increase of pension to William W. Herrick; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GALLINGER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6625) to amend an act to regulate the practice of pharmacy in the District of Columbia, approved June 15, 1878; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 6626) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory," approved June 6, 1900; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PATTERSON introduced a bill (S. 6627) granting an increase of pension to Daniel Jones; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6628) defining the jurisdiction of United States courts in causes to which corporations are parties; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON. I will state that the bill is intended to represent the desires of a very large and respectable number of people of the country, and they have had prepared for the benefit of Congress an argument and brief touching upon and relating to it. I ask that it may be printed as a public document. It is not long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks that the document which he sends to the desk may be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection?

Mr. ALLISON. What is the document?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Its title will be stated to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Argument and brief in support of a bill relating to the jurisdiction of Federal courts over corporations, written, by request, by Henry Cohen and James J. Sullivan, of the Denver bar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 6629) to authorize the President to nominate as second lieutenant of infantry in the United States Army on the retired list the oldest enlisted man on the rolls of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompany paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. FAIRBANKS introduced a bill (S. 6630) granting an increase of pension to John A. J. White; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 6631) granting an increase of pension to Mitchell Hunt; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 6632) granting an increase of pension to Frank Cleaves; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 6633) granting an increase of pension to James Shaffer;

A bill (S. 6634) granting an increase of pension to John W. Branch (with an accompanying paper);

A bill (S. 6635) granting an increase of pension to John P. Brown (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 6636) granting an increase of pension to Herbert C. Miller (with an accompanying paper).

Mr. BEVERIDGE introduced a bill (S. 6637) to reimburse Allen W. Phillips for moneys paid for a substitute in the military service; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOAR (by request) introduced a bill (S. 6638) to authorize the purchase by the United States of the property situated in the District of Columbia known as the Halls of the Ancients; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 144) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to reimburse certain of the employees in the United States navy-yard and naval gun factory at Washington, D. C., for lost time, due to deficit in naval appropriation; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. PENROSE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,062.06 to pay Pacific Pearl Mullett, administratrix of the estate of the late Alfred D. Mullett, the balance due him on account of compensation and expenses as commissioner appointed on the navy-yard commission, under the provisions of the act of August 5, 1882, intended to be proposed by him to the general deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 6331) to provide for laying a single electric railway track across the Aqueduct Bridge in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. FRYE submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the minister to Norway and Sweden from $7,500 to $10,000, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT ON REINDEER IN ALASKA.

Mr. TELLER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be directed to transmit to the Senate the report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson upon "The introduction of domestic reindeer into the district of Alaska," for 1902, with map and illustrations.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 10522) to provide for laying a single electric railway track across the Aqueduct Bridge, in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, was read twice by its title.

ANTHRACITE COAL STRIKE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners, and asking for a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the conference asked for by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. COCKRELL were appointed.

ISTHMIAN CANAL COMMISSION.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, on yesterday the bill (S. 6594) to fix the compensation of the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission to be appointed under the provisions of the act "to provide for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans," approved June 28, 1902, and for other purposes, had its first and second readings, was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed. I now move that it be referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals; but before doing so I wish to correct the print in one particular. In line 11, on page 5, I desire to strike out the word "breadth" and insert "health," which is a misprint.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made, in the absence of objection.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desire for a few moments to explain the object of this bill, in order to lay before the Senate and the country some facts connected with it.

The bill in its first section provides, as is required to be done by the act of June 28, 1902, for the salaries of the members of the Isthmian Canal Commission. No provision is made in the law of June 28, 1902, except to leave these salaries to the discretion of the President. Provision for salaries is left to be acted upon by Congress at such time as it may seem proper to act.

I think it is of very great importance that Congress should fix the salaries of these gentlemen before they are appointed, because, in my opinion, at least, if the salaries are fixed at any reasonable sum it will cut down a great number of applicants who are now pressing the President of the United States for appointment. It will also give the country to understand that a careful economy is to be observed in the construction and management of this great work. My own opinion is—I have put it in the bill, and it is only my opinion, for no member of the committee of which I have the honor to be chairman has conferred with me about it—my opinion is that $5,000 a year is a proper salary for each of the seven commissioners who are to be put in charge of this work, together with such allowances for traveling expenses as would be made in the case of a brigadier-general traveling in the service of the Government.

The salary of $5,000 a year corresponds with the salaries of Senators; and the tenure of office is for life, unless the canal is built before they die. This tenure would be an inducement to the acceptance of a seat in the Senate, even to very distinguished men, as it is a comfortable sum as an annuity for life. So I suppose that gentlemen who are not particularly careful about money matters—about making money out of this job—or those who are willing to work for fair pay, will be entirely willing to fill up these offices and perform the duties of commissioners for $5,000 a year and traveling expenses.

Another section of the bill provides for the appointment by the President of a chief engineer of this work, or his assignment from the Army at a salary of $10,000 a year, with proper allowances for traveling, etc. These salaries and the salaries of the chief surgeon and the paymaster are to be paid upon the requisition of the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission upon the Treasury of the United States in each case. The salary of the chief engineer I put at $10,000, double that of any of the commissioners, because of his responsibilities and because of the immense amount of labor that will be cast upon him necessarily during the construction of the canal. It is a vast undertaking for any man. It requires a man of high ability, and he ought to be very well paid for the work. He is required to be there nearly all of his time looking after the location of this canal and the work that is done upon it, and in supervising all of the inspectors and all of the engineers who have any connection with the work. Therefore his salary ought to be full compensation for a man of great abilities as an engineer, and for extraordinary labor and responsibilities.

The law now provides for the assignment of engineers to assist the commissioners without designating any of them as being chief engineer, and the object of this provision is to meet that omission in the law. It is indispensable to have an engineer in chief to consult with the Commission and to execute their orders. There are to be four engineer commissioners, and in case of equal division of opinion between them on engineering questions, the opinion of the chief engineer of the canal might be a matter of vital consequence. I think that such an officer will be the most useful man, as he will be the most responsible person connected with the construction of the canal.

The payment of money on account of all expenditures, except for the salaries of officers, as provided in this bill, is to be made by paymasters of the Army of the United States under all the legal obligations and all the penalties resting upon them. They are to draw the money upon requisition made by the Isthmian Canal Commission from time to time, and they are to keep it and account for it and pay it out as officers of the Army of the United States are required to do and under the same penalties.

I think that that provision, Mr. President, is of the greatest possible importance. We know what has occurred in regard to an officer of the Army who is charged with, and has been convicted, and I suppose he is guilty of embezzlement to a large amount in connection with public works; and it is necessary that the officer who handles this money shall be subject not only to criminal proceedings in the civil tribunals, but also to military court-martial. It is an enormous fund—$180,000,000—and it will be handled by this officer.

The safeguard of a treasurer's bond is an inadequate security as compared with the official liabilities of a paymaster in the Army of the United States.

The bill provides for the assignment by the President of the United States of a paymaster in chief to take charge of this matter, and such assistant paymasters as he may from time to time designate, fixing the salary of the paymaster in chief at the same rate with that of the commissioners and the salaries of the assistant paymasters at $4,000 each.

A surgeon in chief is also provided for, and he is to be detailed from the surgeons of the Army or the Navy, and such assistants as he may require are to be in like manner detailed by order of the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. I got the impression from what the Senator said, as I listened to him, that the chief engineer was to be one of the commissioners.

Mr. MORGAN. Not at all. There are four engineer commissioners now, and they are put on that Commission of course for the purpose of supervising the chief engineer and all others subordinate to his authority.

Mr. HALE. To what bill is the Senator referring as the bill which fixes these salaries?

Mr. MORGAN. To the bill that I am now proposing.

Mr. HALE. It is not the report of a committee?

Mr. MORGAN. No; the bill has been read the second time, and I am explaining it before it goes to the committee.

Mr. President, that is a general and perhaps a sufficiently substantial statement of the general programme of this bill in regard to the fixing of the salaries, etc.

I return now for one moment to the question of the commissioners. There are seven of them. It has always been my opinion that they are unnecessary in the further prosecution of this work. The Secretary of War should have had charge of it; it should have been a Government work from beginning to end, without interference on the part of anybody, but Congress has fixed it otherwise, and therefore I have no remark to make in opposition to the action of Congress, and no commentary to make upon it further than to state what is my own view of the subject.

I am not trying in this bill to change that act of Congress in the slightest degree, but to so provide as that it can be more effectually executed through the assistance of the seven commissioners. The Isthmian Canal Commission, nine in number, that was in existence, and is in supposititious existence to-day—I do not know when those commissioners will ever cease to hold office—have received during their term of office $265,500 for their services. They have spent, according to the testimony of Colonel Ernst, two weeks on the Isthmus of Panama, in the month of January, the healthy season.

Why they left in two weeks I am unable to say, unless they were afraid of yellow fever, which now prevails in Panama, as is shown by some thirty-four patients who are in the hospital at Portsmouth, Va. They are marines and officers of the Panther, which arrived in that port a few days ago, one of their number having died at Colon. Those patients include two officers, and, besides, a number of convalescents, who have been granted shore leave in order that they may go about and get well. I suppose that the Commission might possibly have met with some such condition at Colon while they were there in January, 1901, or they may have left because they were entirely satisfied that they knew all about the subject after two weeks' observation. The Isthmian Canal Commission spent six weeks in Nicaragua and about the same length of time in Paris.

Now, Mr. President, I have looked through this whole history from the beginning to the end of this project, commencing with the history of the Suez Canal and coming down through all that has been done about it. The Suez Canal itself, although it was a strictly private enterprise, was loaded down by promotion and other charges to the amount of nearly $50,000,000, on which they are now paying dividends, without anything having been earned by these promoters except their activity in getting the canal in condition to raise more on its stock and bonds.

The old Panama Canal Company proper spent $260,000,000, of moneys drawn from the French people. In expending that money they dug a ditch, which comprises, possibly, two-fifths of the actual digging of earth and removing it to embankments, without any structure whatever connected with the canal; and that is all that has been realized out of the expenditure of $260,000,000, except a plant that is of little use in the further prosecution of the work on the canal and stock in the Panama Railroad.

We have spent very large amounts in gaining information and opinions about this canal project; we have spent a large sum in surveys—one made by Childs in Panama, another made by Childs in Nicaragua, two surveys made by Menocal, a commission headed by an officer of the Army, Ludlow, and in the first Walker Commission, and the Isthmian Canal Commission. We have had three commissions and three surveys, for which the Government has paid for the information we have got now; and after purchasing this information at that enormous price, we do not know whether to take it or not. We have not determined whether to accept it or whether to throw much of it away. But the right time to begin for a wise, just, liberal, and at the same time economical administration of the affairs of that canal, wherever it may be located, is right now, and the Congress of the United States ought to fix the pace of expenditure in this matter before we begin to dig or before we have located finally the axial line of this canal. I conceive it to be my duty as chairof the committee to bring the matter to the attention of the country at the present time.

I have mentioned the gross amount of the compensation of the commissioners as $265,500. They reported and have been allowed out of the $1,075,000 which has been appropriated for purposes connected with their work, $697,353.63, which is thus expressed in the report made by the Secretary of State in response to a resolution of the Senate:

Pay of officers and employees, including pay of laborers in Central and South America, $697,353.63.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator the figures there to show, generally, the schedule of salaries that were given to the commissioners on that Commission?

Mr. MORGAN. I have no official information on that subject, Mr. President, from any source. I have been trying for months to get it. The common report is that each of the commissioners gets $1,000 a month, or $12,000 a year for his services. I have no doubt that is true.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator mean to say that nobody knows and nobody can find out how much those gentlemen have received?

Mr. MORGAN. I did not say that. I said I did not know it. I tried my best and I could not find out. That is what I said. I have attempted it by resolution of the Senate, and the response to that resolution is this statement in gross, which I have just read:

Pay of officers and employees, including pay of laborers in Central and South America, $697,353.63.

Not being satisfied with that return, I telegraphed Mr. Hay yesterday, asked him for a more specific return, and especially mentioned the fact of the salaries of the commissioners. He replied this morning that it would take quite a length of time to get an itemized account.

Mr. COCKRELL. I did not catch what the Senator said was the reply of the Secretary.

Mr. MORGAN. I will read it. He says:

It will be impossible to comply with your request to furnish the additional detailed report of the expenses incurred by the commissioners and engineers of the Isthmian Canal Commission within the time you indicate.

I had indicated to-day.

The records are all in the possession of the Auditor for the State Department, and it will be necessary for us to get the records from the Treasury Department in order to make the statement you desire. This will take at least several days of diligent work employing all of our available force.

JOHN HAY.

Mr. HALE. Now, let me ask the Senator, if he should put in a resolution—his resolution is rather general and involves a great deal of work—if he should put in a resolution asking for information to be sent to the Senate as to what sums have been allowed and paid to this Commission as salaries, he ought to get an answer to that the next day.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir; we ought to do a great many things we are not able to do.

Mr. HALE. But clearly that matter in which we are interested now, as to the salaries of the other commissioners, we certainly ought to have. The Senate ought to know what sums have been paid that Commission as salaries, not connected with other questions of expenses and disbursements, but what they have received as salaries. I should like to know that myself.

Mr. MORGAN. I said in my place, Mr. President, that my opinion, formed from conversation with various gentlemen, some of them officials, was that the commissioners had received a thousand dollars a month during the whole time of their service, which has been twenty-nine and one-half months.

Mr. COCKRELL. And expenses in addition?

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes.

Mr. HALE. Of which time how much has been spent on the Isthmus? How much time of these twenty-nine months, in which these gentlemen have been receiving probably a thousand dollars a month besides expenses, has been spent in service and duty on the Isthmus?

Mr. MORGAN. Six weeks in Nicaragua and two weeks in Panama.

Mr. HALE. Eight weeks, or two months out of twenty-nine months.

Mr. MORGAN. Yes. I quote from the testimony of Colonel Ernst that I have before me, and will put it in the RECORD:

Senator KITTREDGE. How many trips have you made to the Isthmus since your connection with the Commission?

Colonel ERNST. Only one.

Senator KITTREDGE. And about when was that?

Colonel ERNST. We went down in January, 1900, and we were there about three months.

Senator KITTREDGE. How much time did you spend on the Nicaragua route?

Colonel ERNST. About six weeks.

Senator KITTREDGE. And the balance of the time on the Panama?

Colonel ERNST. Yes, and in traveling, getting there—about two weeks in Panama.

Mr. HALE. And the Senator thinks the commissioners received for the whole time, no matter where they were or what they were doing, $1,000 a month, besides all expenses?

Mr. MORGAN. That is right.

Mr. HALE. That is a very remarkable statement.

Mr. MORGAN. It is a very true one.

Mr. HALE. I do not question it. Certainly we ought to do something to bring out that fact.

Mr. MORGAN. And it shows the necessity of doing something right now to regulate these expenses before we go on with this great work. In addition to the expenditure for—

1. Pay of officers and employees, including pay of laborers in Central and South America	$697,353.63

There are the following expenditures:

2. Transportation of officers, employees, and laborers from and to the United States, including freight charges on machinery and provisions used in connection with the survey in Central and South America	79,379.63
3. Instruments, machines, tools, etc., used in surveys and investigations of the various canal routes	58,354.76
4. Provisions for use of field parties and others, including expense of Indian treaty, in Central and South America	130,922.48
5. Surgical instruments and supplies, medicines, and medical expenses	3,009.20
6. Rent of offices in the United States	5,397.28
7. Expense of publishing the report of the Nicaraguan Canal Commission	9,875.25
8. Camp outfits, canoes, books, paper, inks, and miscellaneous supplies used in making computations; maps, profiles, plans, etc.; furniture, postage, telegrams, cablegrams, and miscellaneous items difficult to classify	52,189.34
Total	1,036,481.57

So the Government of the United States has paid every expense, of course, that has been incurred in connection with this subject. I am not complaining of it at all; I do not propose to criticise it in the slightest degree; but I merely want to know what the items are, and, of course, I can ascertain them by a resolution which is a little more specific. I thought, Mr. President, that this resolution was specific enough. I will read it:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is directed to send to the Senate a statement of the expenditures of the Isthmian Canal Commission, under the act approved March 3, 1899, "making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," as the same are accounted for by said Isthmian Canal Commission, and also whether there is any deficit in the appropriation which is to be or has been provided for by further appropriations.

I thought when we got the information in the manner in which the Commissioners had accounted we would get all the information that could possibly be needed. We might not want the itemized account for every little expenditure, but these are footed up, and it would be satisfactory if we could get the amount of the vouchers. Of course, the salaries drawn by these gentlemen have been paid on vouchers, and their expenses of travel have been paid on vouchers, and there could be some information gained from a report of that sort, without going into every item of expenditure, which would be quite satisfactory to Congress.

Mr. President, I am not on the floor this morning for the purpose of criticising anything that has been done by the Isthmian Canal Commission or anybody else. They have done what they thought was their duty, and I am not making a criticism or finding fault with them at all. But I am using the matter that is before the Senate for the purpose of informing this body that it is now necessary, in advance of striking one lick upon the canal, to make such provision as will prevent us from running into the horrible iniquities and frauds of the old Panama Canal Company and the new one, who have spent more than $260,000,000 upon that canal in one way and another and have nothing to show for it but two-fifths of a ditch there, which itself has filled up to a large extent.

I wish to observe, also, Mr. President, that this bill provides for the organization of the different departments of the canal work with the approbation of the President of the United States. Without reading it in full, I wish to put into the RECORD the testimony of Colonel Ernst as to a programme or proposition that was prepared by the Isthmian Canal Commission for the future operation of this canal, whether the location might be at Panama or at Nicaragua. They have prepared a programme there which is an enormously expensive one, and they did not report it to the President or to the Senate for the reason that they could not agree upon all of the detailed items of it, as stated in the testimony of Colonel Ernst, which I will put into my remarks.

It is a programme, Mr. President, that would be quite sufficient for the government of the Philippine Islands, but it would be very unfortunate if we were to adopt such a plan with reference to the canal or the Philippine Islands, because it requires a board of control to be here in Washington City, with a salary of $15,000 to each of the members. It requires a governor of the canal, with a cabinet of engineers and other officials down there, to reside in the canal zone, and the expense of this proposed government foots up a very large sum of money—$2,024,134 annually for the Panama Canal and $3,350,822 for the Nicaragua Canal—for the maintenance of the canals.

Mr. President, the Suez Canal has carried through all of its operations of maintenance and repairs for $1,300,000, as reported from a bureau of the Treasury Department of the United States. It was an enterprise then unprecedented. They had the experience of no nation and no country to guide them in respect of their expenditures, and they were very large.

Now, these two boards of governors and controllers are not required in respect of the construction of the canal, but in respect of its maintenance after it is constructed and finished. Well, being admonished as to the very large amounts of money that the commission think it necessary to expend in the maintenance of the canal, whether at Nicaragua or at Panama, I think it is time, before we begin this work, that the President of the United States should have a voice with them in arranging the different subordinate officers and classes of officers who will be concerned in the conduct of this enterprise, and in fixing their compensation. And that is one of the chief objects of the bill I now have the honor to present to the Senate.

I will not make any further observations at this time, having merely called attention to the general outline of the bill and its general purposes; and I move its reference to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals. I will insert in an appendix to my remarks the testimony of Colonel Ernst, one of the Isthmian Canal Commission, in response to inquiries as to their estimates for the cost of maintenance of the respective canals, after completion, and a plan of government and administration of the canal on either route that may be selected. They are, in my judgment, so wildly extravagant and unnecessary as to excite very serious apprehension of the future of the canals unless Congress should now take this matter in hand.

The motion was agreed to.

APPENDIX.

[Extracts from statement of Col. Oswald H. Ernst before a subcommittee of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, United States Senate, February 18, 1902.]

The CHAIRMAN. Could you name here the appendix that contains those estimates? We have been very much at a loss to find out about them.

Colonel ERNST. We did not publish those, because it is purely theoretical; we felt that we could not defend every estimate of it. We felt that there were errors both ways. You can conceive of the difficulty of getting up of such an organization at a desk for a great work like that, which must actually be tested and corrected in practice. I mean it must be adjusted. There are many of those items that we felt would err, some on one side and some on the other, and we thought that they would correct each other; but doing it the same for both lines, we thought it was a fair comparison.

The CHAIRMAN. You made a comparison in your own minds, based upon facts that you yourselves had observed on the line or had learned from other sources, but you did not make up an itemized statement and balance sheet between the cost of maintenance on the one route and the other.

Colonel ERNST. Oh, yes; we went through this organization for both canals. Of course, the Nicaragua Canal had the same general control. The governing board in this country would be the same as for the Panama and also the governor and his staff on the Isthmus would be the same and the chiefs of these departments would all be the same. Now, when it came to the number of posts you would have to have for police force, there would be more on the Nicaragua than on the Panama. We would have to have more engineering divisions.

The CHAIRMAN. What I want to get at is whether the items were put down on the list?

Colonel ERNST. Oh, I have got them all, and I would be very glad to show them to you. I have not got them here to-day, but I can bring them if you wish to see them.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday, February 18, 1902.

The subcommittee met at 3 o'clock p. m.

Present: Senator MORGAN (Chairman).

Also Senator KITTREDGE, a member of the committee.

Additional statement of Col. Oswald H. Ernst.

The CHAIRMAN. Did you get the paper I referred to?

Colonel ERNST. Yes; here it is.

The CHAIRMAN. I would like very much to have this go into the record. It may become very important if the canal should be built.

Colonel ERNST. It is very carefully gotten up. The reason we did not publish it is because there are undoubtedly errors in it. Estimates are too high in some respects and too low in others. We thought they would correct each other. The comparison, however, is a fair one. It is the same for both canals. It is a study to which we have devoted a good many weeks. It is as follows:

TENTATIVE ORGANIZATION FOR THE MAINTENANCE AND OPERATION OF THE CANALS.

I. NICARAGUA CANAL.

Supreme control to rest in a board of five members, located in Washington. The duties of the board will be:

1. To make regulations for the government of the canal, including the tariff of charges, navigation rules, police and sanitary rules, and, in short, all rules required for the operation and maintenance of the canal.

2. To make or approve all appointments the salary of which equals or exceeds $100 per month.

3. To make or approve all contracts.

4. To audit all money accounts before transmitting them to the Treasury Department.

The annual expenses of the board may be placed at $100,000.

Organization on the Isthmus.—The general control to be vested in a governor having his headquarters at Greytown, where the general offices will be located.

The administration will be divided among six departments, viz:

A. Engineer department, charged with all the maintenance and improvement of the canal, including the repair shops and storehouses and the repairs of public buildings; also with the location and sale or rental of lands.

B. Transit department, charged with the navigation of the canal, the assessment of dues, the service of the ports, including light-houses, and the operation of telegraph and telephone lines.

C. Medical department, charged with the hospital and other medical service, including port, quarantine, and sanitary inspection service.

D. Finance department, charged with the collection of dues, payment of salaries, and management of the funds.

E. Law department, charged with the supervision of such minor courts as may be established and with all legal matters.

F. Police department, charged with the preservation of order and with the management of the armed forces required for that purpose.

The governor.—The governor will issue orders to the heads of departments, will make reports to the board of control, and conduct all correspondence with that board, and will make frequent inspection of all parts of the canal. Attached to his office will be a secretary, two clerks, two messengers, and one small inspection steamer, the latter to be available for other officials when not required by the governor.

Annual expense of governor's office.

Salaries:
Governor	$15,000
Secretary	5,000
Clerks, 2 at $1,500	3,000
Messengers, 2 at $400	800
Inspection steamer	15,000
Office supplies	500
Total	39,300

A. Engineer department.—At the head of this department will be a chief engineer at $7,500. In his immediate office will be one draftsman, at $1,500; one chief clerk, at $2,000; one clerk, at $1,500; one stenographer, at $1,500, and one messenger, at $400. The chief engineer will have an inspection steamer at $15,000.

There will be a general shop at Greytown, under the charge of a master mechanic, at $3,000, who will employ 2 foremen mechanics, at $2,000; 10 mechanics, at $1,500; 10 helpers, at $360; 1 master laborer, at $900; 5 laborers, at $360, and 1 clerk, at $1,200. The master mechanic will also have general charge of the branch shops, to be located at Boca San Carlos, Fort San Carlos, and Brito. In each of these shops there will be employed 1 foreman mechanic, at $2,000; 3 mechanics, at $1,500; 3 helpers, at $360; 1 master laborer, at $900; 4 laborers, at $360, and 1 clerk, at $1,200. The shops should be partially self-supporting. If charged entirely against the canal this salary list should be sufficient to cover such materials as the canal may use in the shops.

There will be a general storehouse at Greytown and a branch storehouse at each of the other points where shops are to be located. The general storehouse will be under charge of a general storekeeper, at $2,400, who will employ four clerks, at $1,500, and ten laborers, at $360. At each branch storehouse there will be a storekeeper, at $2,000, one clerk, at $1,500, and four laborers, at $360.

For purposes of maintenance the canal will be divided into three divisions, the Atlantic division, extending from the Caribbean to and including the dam; the middle division, extending from the dam to deep water in Lake Nicaragua, and the Pacific division, extending from Lake Nicaragua to the Pacific. Each division will be under the immediate charge of an assistant engineer, at $3,000, with one draftsman, at $1,500, and one stenographer, at $1,500. The headquarters of the respective divisions will be at Boca San Carlos, Fort San Carlos, and Brito.

In the Atlantic division there will be maintained one seagoing dredge, which will be mainly employed at Greytown Harbor, at an annual cost of $65,000; one ordinary dredge, at $65,000; one pile driver, at $5,000; two steam tugs, at $14,000; six dump scows, at $1,000, and six flat scows, at $300 each, these figures including pay roll and maintenance of plant. The plant will be under charge of an overseer, at $2,400; three master laborers, at $900, and, say, sixty laborers, at $360 each.

The Middle and Pacific divisions will each have the same plant and force, except the seagoing dredge, and one less master laborer and twenty less laborers. The seagoing dredge provided for Greytown will also perform the necessary dredging at Brito.

It is not expected that this force will provide for the depreciation of the metal and masonry structures. For the metal structures, which include lock gates, sluices, and operating machinery, the annual depreciation is estimated to be 7½ per cent of the cost; for the masonry structures, one-half of 1 per cent of the cost.

The land office will have one clerk, at $1,800.

Annual expense of the engineer department.

Salaries:
Chief engineer	$7,500
Assistant engineers, 3, at $3,000	9,000
Draftsmen, 4, at $1,500	6,000
Master mechanic	3,000
Foremen mechanics, 5, at $2,000	10,000
Mechanics, 19, at $1,500	28,500
Helpers, 19, at $360	6,840
Master laborers, 11, at $900	9,900
Laborers, 179, at $360	64,440
General storekeeper	2,400
Storekeepers, 3, at $2,000	6,000
Overseers, 3, at $2,400	7,200
Clerks—
One at $2,000	2,000
One at $1,800	1,800
Eight at $1,500	12,000
Four at $1,200	4,800
Stenographers, 4, at $1,500	6,000
Messenger	400
Plant:
Inspection steamer	15,000
Dredges, 4, at $6,500	260,000
Pile drivers, 3, at $5,000	15,000
Tugs, 6, at $14,000	84,000
Scows—
Eighteen at $1,000	18,000
Eighteen at $300	5,400
Supplies	100,000
Depreciation of metal structures (7½ per cent on $6,062,000)	454,650
Depreciation of masonry (one-half of 1 per cent on $33,176,400)	165,882
Total	1,305,712

B. Transit department.—At the head of this department will be a general superintendent, at $7,500. In his immediate office there will be one chief clerk, at $2,000; two clerks, at $1,500; two clerks, at $1,200; one stenographer, at $1,500; one chief telegrapher, at $1,800, and one messenger, at $400. II. PANAMA CANAL.

Supreme control to rest in a board of not less than five members, located at Washington. The duties of this board will be:

1. To make regulations for the government of the canal, including the tariff of charges, navigation rules, police and sanitary rules, and, in short, all rules required for the operation and maintenance of the canal.

2. To make or approve all appointments to office of which the salary equals or exceeds $100 per month.

3. To make or approve all contracts.

4. To audit all money accounts before transmitting them to the Treasury Department.

The expenses of this board may be placed at $100,000.

Organization at the isthmus.—The general control of all the affairs of the canal to be vested in a governor, having his headquarters at Colon, where are to be located the general offices.

The administration to be divided among six departments, viz:

A. Engineer department, charged with all the works for the maintenance and improvement of the canal, and with the repair shops and storehouses; also the repair of the public buildings, and with the location and sale or rental of lands.

B. Transit department, charged with the navigation of the canal, the assessment of dues, the service of the ports, including light-houses, the operation of the Panama Railroad, and of telegraph and telephone lines.

C. Medical department, charged with the hospital and other medical service, including port quarantine, and the sanitary inspection service.

D. Finance department, charged with the collection of dues, payment of salaries, and management of the funds.

E. Law department, charged with the supervision of such minor courts as may be established, and with all legal matters.

F. Police department, charged with the preservation of order and with the management of the armed force required for that purpose.

The governor.—To issue orders to the heads of departments and receive reports from them; to make reports to the home government and conduct all correspondence with that government; to make frequent inspections of all parts of the canal. His salary will be $15,000. Attached to his office will be one secretary, at $5,000; two clerks, at $1,500 each; two messengers, at $400 each, and one small inspection steamer, at $15,000, the latter to be available for other officials when not required by the governor. Supplies for this office, $500.

Recapitulation for governor's office.

Governor	$15,000
Secretary	5,000
Two clerks, at $1,500 each	3,000
Two messengers, at $400 each	800
One inspection steamer	15,000
Office supplies	500
Total	39,300

A. Engineer department.—At the head of this department will be a chief engineer, at $7,500. Attached to his office will be an assistant engineer, at $3,000; two draftsmen, at $1,500 each; one chief clerk, at $2,000; one stenographer, at $1,500; one clerk, at $1,500, and one messenger, at $400.

The general shops will be located at Colon. They will be under the charge of one master mechanic, at $3,000; who will employ, say, two foremen mechanics, at $2,000 each; ten mechanics, at $1,500 each, with ten helpers, at $360 each; one clerk, at $1,200; one master laborer, at $900, and five laborers, at $360 each.

Subsidiary shops will be located at Matachin and at La Boca. Together they will employ two foremen mechanics, at $2,000 each; six mechanics, at $1,500 each, with six helpers, at $360 each, and two clerks, at $1,200 each; two master laborers, at $900 each, and eight laborers, at $360 each. The shops should be partially self-supporting. If charged entirely against the canal, this salary list should be sufficient to cover such materials as the canal may use in the shops.

The general storehouses will be located at Colon. They will be under the charge of one chief storekeeper, at $2,400, who will employ four clerks, at $1,500 each, and, say, ten laborers, at $360 each. Subsidiary storehouses will be located at Matachin and at La Boca and together will employ two storekeepers, at $2,000 each; two clerks, at $1,500 each, and eight laborers, at $360 each.

For purposes of maintenance and repair the canal will be divided into two sections, the Atlantic and Pacific sections, the first extending from Colon to and including the Obispo gates, the second extending from the Obispo gates to Panama Bay. In each section will be maintained 1 dredge, at $65,000; 1 pile driver, at $5,000; 2 steam tugs, at $14,000 each; 6 dump scows, at $1,000 each, and 6 flat scows, at $300 each. The principal employees in each, besides the crews of the dredges, tugs, and pile driver, will be 1 overseer, at $2,400, and 2 master laborers, at $900 each; and say, 40 laborers, at $360 each. The building supplies needed for this force, in addition to what they can obtain themselves, will consist mainly of lumber and cement, for which allow $50,000.

The land office will be in charge of 1 land clerk, at $1,800.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, to report it with an amendment and to submit a report thereon, which I ask may be printed. I give notice that I will try to call up the bill to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I ask unanimous consent to call up the militia bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. Will the senior Senator from Vermont yield to me for a moment to call up a local bill and have it passed? It will not meet with any discussion. I desire to state to the Senator that it is a matter where parties are prepared to do the work at this time, and the passage of the bill will not consume more than a minute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PROCTOR. I could not hear the Senator's request, but I will yield.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to ask the Senate to consider the bill, Calendar No. 2188——

Mr. PROCTOR. I beg pardon. I have refused several Senators an opportunity to call up for consideration other measures, and I regret very much that I can not yield to the Senator from Georgia. To be fair to them I must adhere to what I have said. I think the Senator will have no trouble in calling up the bill after 2 o'clock.

Mr. CLAY. Very well, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] offered an amendment to strike out section 24. To that amendment the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] offered an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 16, section 24, line 2, after the word "service," it is proposed to strike out the remainder of the bill down to and including the word "year," in line 14, as follows:

The persons so enrolled shall report for drill, inspection, and instruction at such times and places to be specified and under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of War, and each person so reporting shall, during the time of such service, be subject, as far as practicable, to the regulations and discipline governing the military establishment and shall be entitled to the same pay and allowances as are or may be provided by law for the Army of the United States, to be paid out of the appropriation for the pay of the Army, but in time of peace, except in case of threatened invasion, said national volunteer reserve shall not be required to perform military duty to exceed ten days in any one year.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I desire to know whether the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio was proposed as a substitute for the amendment which I submitted at a former time. What is it? Is it a substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands it to be an amendment to perfect the section which the Senator from Alabama moved to strike out entirely, and it is entitled to consideration before the proposed amendment of the Senator from Alabama. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. PROCTOR. I will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MORGAN. Let it be again stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will again be stated to the Senate.

The Secretary again stated Mr. FORAKER'S amendment.

Mr. BATE. There seem to be two editions of the bill. I ask what section is referred to? It is not on the thirteenth page.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is the sixteenth page.

Mr. FORAKER. The sixteenth page.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Section 24.

Mr. BATE. I have two prints of the bill. Which is it—the last one?

Mr. COCKRELL. The last one, as ordered reprinted as agreed to in the Committee of the Whole, December 9, 1902.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the language in line 25 on the fifteenth page. Perhaps it ought to be changed in order to make his amendment harmonious. I refer to the words "other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction." Having stricken them out in the succeeding lines, they perhaps ought to be stricken out here.

Mr. FORAKER. "Other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction." All right. I have no objection.

Mr. BACON. I understand the Senator from Vermont has accepted the amendment, and that there is no vote to be taken upon it.

Mr. FORAKER. Let it be understood, also, whether the Senator from Vermont accepts the suggestion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, Now that certain words have been stricken out on my suggestion, the Senator from Wisconsin suggests that in line 25, page 15, in order to make the bill harmonious the following words should also go out:

Other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], as amended by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], is agreed to without objection.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator from Ohio if that leaves the bill in just the condition he would like to leave it as to lines 22, 23, and 24?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARREN. Are the words "but in the event they shall be called into the service of the United States" included in what you propose to strike out?

Mr. SPOONER. No.

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. SPOONER. With the words stricken out as I suggest it would read in this way:

Such enrollment shall in each case continue for a period of five years, but in the event they shall be called into the service of the United States they shall be entitled to be discharged at the close of the war or after nine months' service.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is right.

Mr. FORAKER. That, I think, is right.

Mr. SPOONER. It simply perfects it.

Mr. TELLER. Does that all go out as read by the Senator?

Mr. COCKRELL. No.

Mr. SPOONER. All that goes out is embraced within the words "other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] was recognized.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, of course, I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which has now been accepted, makes this section less objectionable. I might agree, however, with what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] stated yesterday, that with this amendment the section is of not very much practical operation. The common suggestion that it can do little harm does not constitute a sufficient reason why a bill which has evil in it should be passed, or why an amendment or any portion of a bill that has evil in it should be agreed to. I wish very much that the committee would eliminate this feature of the bill. I think I will be able to show that it has no part properly in the bill. It is not properly a part of a militia bill. It is the introduction into our regular military establishment of an altogether new feature, and, I repeat, a feature which in no sense has any connection with the militia branch of the service.

This is a bill having for its professed purpose the reorganization of the general militia of the United States. As such it is a most important bill. As such it is one which must interest every Senator, not only from a national standpoint, but from the standpoint of the State which he represents. One of the fundamental ideas in the formation of this Government was the reliance of the Government upon the militia for its defense, and therefore we find that in the formation of the Constitution it is provided for, and among the first enactments of the Congress of the United States, after the formation of the Government, was the law organizing the militia.

Mr. President, I think that this portion of the pending bill, found in section 24, is violative of the spirit and intent of the Constitution, and I hope I may have the attention of Senators who favor this section, because I desire that they may consider the suggestion which I am now about to make. I repeat—and I believe it will be so recognized by Senators—that section 24 is violative of the spirit and intent of the Constitution, if not violative of its letter.

Now, of course, if the position taken by the learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] yesterday is correct, that this is a part of the militia system, it would undoubtedly be in violation of its letter, because it prescribes duties which the Constitution prohibits among those which can be imposed upon the militia. There is no possible question about the fact that it is not a part of the militia, so far as its letter goes. But I think it is violative of the spirit and intent of the Constitution in that it makes a part of the regular establishment that which the Constitution intended should be the militia. You are calling it by a different name. In that way you are technically taking it without the prohibition of the Constitution, whereas it is in fact a part of that which the Constitution makers had in contemplation when they provided for the organization of the militia.

The Constitution of the United States recognizes two classes of soldiery and makes special provision for them, and one is the Regular Army and the other is the militia. It gives to the Congress, to use the language of the Constitution, power—

To raise and to support armies.

What armies does the Constitution contemplate when it gives that power to Congress? That is entirely apart from any military organization in the States. It is entirely apart from anything of which the States have any control. It is particularly and peculiarly to be the military branch of the National Government, under the distinct control of the National Government, to be organized by the National Government, to be equipped by the National Government, and paid by the National Government, and a restriction is put upon the power of the National Government in that particular to the extent of saying there shall be no appropriation for that purpose exceeding two years.

Of course that limitation has no special significance relative to this bill except for the purpose of illustrating the fact that the contemplation of the Constitution was that the Regular Army should be a regular establishment in the regular service of the Government, as contradistinguished from the citizen soldiery, which was all recognized as belonging to the class known and denominated as the militia.

The citizen soldiery, in the contemplation of the Constitution, was to constitute the militia, and the framers of the Constitution having in view distinctly these two classes of soldiery made two distinct provisions. One was that the Regular Army—I am not quoting the language, but the effect of the language—should be raised and organized and supported by the National Government and should be under its exclusive control. The other was that the citizen soldiery of this country, which was to be called upon in cases of emergency, should be under the control of the States so far as concerned their organization and officering, with certain privileges allowed to Congress as to the provisions that should be made with reference to them. But the provision which is in the same article of the Constitution with reference to the militia is in these words:

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

It is entirely proper for Congress under that clause to enact the provisions contemplated in this bill for the proper discipline of the militia, but when, Mr. President, you take a part of the citizen soldiery who are not in the regular service, as it has been heretofore recognized, who are not to be taken from their duties as civilians, from their ordinary vocations of life, who are to remain citizen soldiery, but who are nevertheless to be organized as a reserve for the Regular Army, officered by the United States Government, and subject to be called out by the President without reference to the militia law, you invade the province which it was intended should be without the distinct province of the Government of the United States in the organization of an army; you violate and defeat that which was the plain intent and purpose of the Constitution.

Mr. President, why was it that the Constitution makers said that in the militia there should be reserved to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers? Did they desire to insure the separation of the citizen soldiery of the country from the Regular Army, or can it be imagined that they were splitting hairs and contemplated such a technicality as must be resorted to to sustain section 24 of this bill? Was it in contemplation that under a technicality the citizen soldiery could be divided into two classes—one class to be known as militia, composed of citizen soldiery, another class to be known as the volunteer reserve, and also composed of citizen soldiery—or was it the intent of the Constitution that all the citizen soldiery should be known as the militia? And whether the purpose is good or bad, wise or unwise, necessary or unnecessary, it is nevertheless the provision of the Constitution that they, the militia, shall stand distinct and apart and that the States shall have the right to officer them. When you divide them into two classes, all citizen soldiery, but one part to be known as the militia, to be officered by the States, and the other part, still citizen soldiery, to be known as volunteer reserve and officered by the United States, the purpose of the Constitution is defeated.

Aside from that I respectfully submit, sir, that it is an unnecessary provision. Outside of the purpose to enlarge practically the standing army I can conceive of no reason why there should be a volunteer reserve, as it is called, which shall be apart from the volunteer soldiery, a different part altogether, unless it be the apprehension that in time of war, in time of emergency, there will be an insufficiency of response on the part of the volunteer soldiery to meet the demands which would arise to meet such an emergency. Has there ever been anything in the past which would indicate any such danger? Is there anything which could possibly suggest such a danger in the future? Why is it that we are to have two classes of citizen soldiery, unless, forsooth, there is danger that the one will be insufficient to answer the purpose. Everyone knows that in time of need there is practically no limit to the number of volunteer soldiers who would promptly be at the call of the Government.

For over a hundred years we have had this system. For over a hundred years we have had but one class of citizen soldiery, and that is known as the militia. Sir, who shall define militia to be other than citizen soldiery? Who shall define militia to be other than that which has been known and accepted to be militia since 1792—the citizen soldiery of the country? If that is the meaning of it, if that was the intent of the framers of the Constitution, by what right do we at this late date seek to evade the plain provisions of the Constitution for that purpose? How is it that we are at this day to say in the passage of a law that there shall be a part of the citizen soldiery subject to be called into the service of the United States which shall not be a part of the militia?

Mr. President, the provision of this section of the bill is that the volunteer reserve, as it is called, shall be made up of those who have served in the militia or who have served in the Regular Army of the United States. They are to be enrolled, and although under the amendment which was adopted there will be no drills or anything of the kind, they are to be enrolled, and, I suppose, necessarily organized. How they are to be organized if they are never to be gathered together for inspection or drill I do not know.

This twenty-fourth section erects within each State two different classes of citizen soldiery, one of which will necessarily be the particular object of care on the part of the United States Government. It is true that the bill provides that the militia shall have proper equipment, proper organization, proper drill, and proper discipline, and all of that I most heartily approve, but, nevertheless, if you have in each State one class of citizen soldiery which shall be distinct from the other, which shall be in no manner subject to State law, which shall be in no manner subject to the call of the executive of the State, which shall have its wants supplied by the National Government, which shall have its officers supplied by the National Government, you necessarily have a class of men who will in time come to be recognized as higher in rank than the other class organized under State law, because of the vast resources of the National Government and the extremely restricted resources of the State government.

Mr. President, I repeat, I trust that this part of the bill will not be insisted upon. I am ready to respond to anything which the Senators in charge of the measure may insist upon as important for the militia, but this is not a part of the organization of the militia. I venture to say that there was not one Senator in ten, nay, not one in fifty, outside of the Committee on Military Affairs who knew the fact that in that bill, which was denominated as a militia bill, there was included a provision for the organization of an army of 100,000 men, which should belong to the regular establishment and be a part of the Regular Army, although it is, if you please, a dormant part of that regular establishment. It is nevertheless a fact that under a bill to reorganize the militia we have here introduced a provision with reference to the Regular Army of the United States, and a most important and far-reaching part.

I appeal to Senators to let us proceed with the bill for the reorganization of the militia. Strike out this twenty-fourth section, so that we may all give our support to the militia bill, because we are all interested in it. I desire to say, for myself, that with possibly one or two minor provisions, which I do not entirely approve, I most heartily approve of the bill, so far as it relates to the militia.

I think it is of extreme importance that we should have a new law with reference to the militia, because conditions have changed and it is highly important that the militia should be organized in accordance with the changed conditions. When the act of 1792, which organized the militia of the United States, was passed, it contained some provisions that this bill contains, in that it makes every man in the United States between 18 and 45 one of the militia, except only certain exempted parties; but when that act was passed conditions were very different. Then any man who knew how to use his sporting gun would know how to use the gun that he would have to use in time of war, and any man who had ordinary capacity could within a very few days be instructed in the simple evolutions which were necessary to make him an organized soldier.

But conditions have entirely changed. A man may now be an expert in the use of a sporting gun and be utterly ignorant of the use of the military arm. He may not only be so, but he is so in nine hundred and nine-nine cases out of one thousand, because in the development of military arms they are entirely different, and it takes specific instructions in order to fit a man to use a military arm.

Therefore, in the organization of the militia at the present day, in order that they may be made promptly effective in time of need, it is important that they should be organized and disciplined and drilled as the Army is drilled; that they should be instructed in the use of these arms, which are entirely different in construction, and the range of which is entirely different. It is important, in view of the changed methods growing out of the changed conditions in arms, that they should be organized into bodies of corresponding character and size, divisions, etc., so that the militia may, when ordered into active service, be ready for immediate and effective service.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is, as I said, without going into details, that I regard this bill as extremely important. I am extremely anxious that it shall be passed, so far as it relates to the militia, but I can see no reason why this measure should be encumbered with another measure which has no relation whatever to the militia, which does not belong to the militia, and which would be utterly unconstitutional if it did pertain to the militia, and which can only be defended on the ground that it is intended as an appendix to the Regular Army.

Mr. President, if we are to have any legislation with reference to the Regular Army let us have it separate and apart. Why should it be brought in here under the guise or under the wing, if you please, of a bill for the reorganization of the militia? Certainly the organization of the Regular Army is a matter of sufficient importance to be dealt with separately and apart. It is a matter of sufficient importance to stand on its own ground and by its own strength, and not be brought here and put through as a part of a militia bill, because, forsooth, there is a necessity for the reorganization of the militia, and because by reason of that fact there is great influence in favor of the passage of a militia bill, and properly so. I want the Regular Army brought up to the highest state of efficiency, and I am ready to contribute all in my power to that end. But to accomplish this it is not necessary to mix legislation of the Army with that of the militia.

The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate are certainly capable of presenting to the Senate and the House committee to the House an independent measure with reference to the Army without having to have it supported and buttressed by the strength of a bill for the reorganization of the militia.

Mr. President, everything which relates to the standing army is a most important matter. It is a matter that requires the greatest care on the part of Congress when we come to talk of legislating about a standing army. We have had a great change in the last two or three years in the standing army.

While it may be, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said on yesterday, that section 24 of this bill is to a great extent futile, with the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], still, Mr. President, it is the foundation, it is the beginning, and what may now be lacking of the bill, or this part of it, as it has been amended, will be more easily supplied hereafter. It will be said, "Here we have an organization and it is ineffective, a part of the Regular Army;" and then it will be amended and added to, and this volunteer reserve will become the important part of the volunteer soldiery, and the militia and the volunteer soldiery of the States will gradually be depreciated and become insignificant.

I desire, Mr. President, that the learned Senators who support this bill will answer the suggestion which I have made as to whether or not it is violative of the spirit of the Constitution when they make a part of the citizen soldiery of the country a part of the standing army of the country, and that is exactly what this section does.

It takes the citizen soldiery and simply by changing the name from what the Constitution intended it should all be known by, to wit, the militia, makes a part of the citizen soldiery a part of the standing army of the country, and what is now a hundred thousand men may be in the near future, without any greater change than that we have already seen, a million men, and it may be that within a very short time this feature of the bill, now so comparatively insignificant, may become the great dominating military feature in the legislation of this country.

Mr. President, it is too serious a matter for us to pass upon it as a part of the militia bill when it is not a part of it at all. I may be mistaken about it, I may be overapprehensive about such things, but I think it is an extremely grave proposition, an absolute departure from anything that has ever been seen in the Government of the United States heretofore, when you say that a part of the citizen soldiery of the country shall become a part of the Regular Army of the United States, subject to the call of the President of the United States, not subject in any manner to State law, not officered by the States, and in no particular subject to the control or call of the governor of the State.

It will not do to say there is no danger in this because it can only be done when Congress authorizes it. Congress will have already authorized it when you pass it. Whenever you pass this bill there is a law upon the statute books by which it is available at the call of the President of the United States.

Possibly I am incorrect in that construction. I understand the bill has been amended, by striking out on page 16 from line 2 to line 20. Am I correct?

Mr. FORAKER. To line 14.

Mr. BACON. It does not go beyond that?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. BACON. Now, I will call the attention of Senators to the language as it now reads:

> Whenever a volunteer force shall be called for by authority of Congress, and the members of any companies, troops, battalions, etc.—

They "shall be received as the first organizations of such volunteer force." And in line 20:

> Whenever a volunteer force shall be called for by authority of Congress, exceeding in number the companies, troops, batteries, battalions, and regiments of the organized militia which shall enlist, etc.

Now, what does that mean? Does it mean that whenever a volunteer force shall be called for by authority of Congress hereafter granted? Does it mean to limit the power of the President of the United States to the use of this particular body of soldiery to such purposes as shall hereafter be authorized by Congress, or does it mean to extend to all purposes which are authorized by Congress, whether that authority has been heretofore granted or shall be hereafter granted? Why, manifestly the latter.

Manifestly under this particular provision of the bill—I say "this particular provision" because I am in favor of the bill as a whole, and very much so—under the provisions of section 24, the President of the United States is authorized to call for this body of soldiery whenever an emergency arises under the law as then existing. Whether it is a law passed prior to the present time or subsequent to the present time, he is authorized to call out troops.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair). The Senator from Georgia will suspend while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is in possession of the floor.

Mr. QUAY. I ask the Senator from Vermont to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Will my colleague allow me to give a notice?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. I wish to give notice that I shall ask consent to-morrow morning to take up the militia bill at the expiration of the morning business.

Mr. BACON. I presume the Senator will recognize my right to proceed at that time. I was right in the midst of what I had to say.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Georgia has the floor upon the bill when it again comes before the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. Have we not some special order for to-morrow after the routine morning business?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; we have.

Mr. KEAN. There is a special order.

Mr. QUAY. There are eulogies to be delivered.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Eulogies on the late Senator SEWELL.

Mr. TILLMAN. I suppose that to-morrow is a dies non, so far as the militia bill and the statehood bill are concerned.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that there has been no special order made by the Senate, but that notice simply has been given.

Mr. TILLMAN. Notice in that case is equivalent to an order, and always has been.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not recognize the giving of a notice as equivalent to an order made by the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I am only speaking of cases of eulogies. It has been the universal custom in the Senate since I have been here for everybody to recognize the obligation of the Senate in such a case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is now informed from the Secretary's desk that the Senator from South Carolina is correct. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] gave the following notice:

That on Wednesday, December 17, after the routine morning business, he will submit resolutions in regard to the death of his late colleague, WILLIAM J. SEWELL, in order that appropriate tribute may be paid to his memory.

The Senator from South Carolina is correct.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to send to the Secretary's desk a telegram in relation to the statehood bill, and I ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks that the telegram sent to the desk by him may be read for the information of the Senate. In the absence of objection, it will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ROCK ISLAND DEPOT, ENID, OKLA., December 10, 1902.

Hon. MATTHEW S. QUAY,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

Enthusiastic meeting, December 10, passed following resolutions for omnibus bill:

"Whereas systematic and fraudulent efforts have been made to mislead members of the United States Senate as to the wishes of the people of Oklahoma in relation to statehood; and

"Whereas an overwhelming majority of the people of Oklahoma, irrespective of party affiliations, are opposed to the single statehood measure of Senator BEVERIDGE, and desire statehood under the conditions of the omnibus bill now pending in the Senate: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Commercial Club of the city of Enid most earnestly requests the friends of Oklahoma in the Senate to urge the passage of the omnibus bill, and under all conditions to oppose the Beveridge measure.

"Resolved, That the secretary telegraph a copy of these resolutions to Senators QUAY and BAILEY, and request that they be presented to the Senate."

O. F. FLEMING,
President.
FRED. A. WILSON,
Secretary pro tempore.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. QUAY. I still have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the Senator had only asked for the reading of the telegram.

Mr. QUAY. I was waiting to hear from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE]. He was about to address an inquiry to me, as I supposed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was waiting for what the Senator had to say and then, out of order, I wish to ask permission to introduce sundry bills for appropriate reference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield for that purpose to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. QUAY. I do.

[The bills introduced by Mr. BEVERIDGE appear under the heading, "Bills introduced."]

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. QUAY. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the indulgence of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Vermont also while I request of the Senate permission to put upon its passage a bill of local interest to my people. It will take but a few moments.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection if the bill provokes no discussion.

Mr. DUBOIS. If it does I shall immediately withdraw it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. We have no objection.

FORT HALL RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 6502) relating to ceded lands on the Fort Hall Indian Reservation.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 3, after the word "Interior," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That the improvements made by certain Indians upon the following-described lands, namely, lot 4, sec. 1, and the SE. ¼ of the NE. ¼, sec. 18, and the SE. ¼ of the NW. ¼ and the NW. ¼ of the SW. ¼ of sec. 8, in T. 7 S., R. 35 E., and the E. ½ of the SE. ¼ of sec. 21, T. 6 S., R. 34 E., and which have heretofore been appraised, shall be paid for at the said appraised value, at the time of and by the person making entry of the respective tracts upon which such improvements are situated.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill what amount of land this includes.

Mr. DUBOIS. There is a short report here from the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs explaining it and recommending it very strongly. It includes about 60,000 acres of land.

Mr. PETTUS. Is the land in the Indian reservation?

Mr. DUBOIS. No. The land has been ceded to the Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Indian Affairs was to strike out the remainder of the bill in the following words:

The section 5 referred to above is as follows:

"SEC. 5. That on the completion of the allotments and the preparation of the schedule provided for in the preceding section, and the classification of the lands as provided for herein, the residue of said ceded lands shall be opened to settlement by the proclamation of the President, and shall be subject to disposal under the homestead, town-site, stone and timber, and mining laws of the United States only, excepting as to price and excepting the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each Congressional township, which shall be reserved for common-school purposes and be subject to the laws of Idaho: Provided, That all purchasers of lands lying under the canal of the Idaho Canal Company, and which are susceptible of irrigation from the water from said canal, shall pay for the same at the rate of $10 per acre; all agricultural lands not under said canal shall be paid for at the rate of $2.50 per acre, and grazing lands at the rate $1.25 per acre, one-fifth of the respective sums to be paid at time of original entry, and four-fifths thereof at the time of making final proof; but no purchaser shall be permitted in any manner to purchase more than 160 acres of the land hereinbefore referred to; but the rights of honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors, as defined and described in sections 2304 and 2305 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, shall not be abridged, except as to the sum to be paid as aforesaid.

"The classification as to agricultural and grazing lands shall be made by an employee of the General Land Office, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

"No lands in sections 16 and 36 now occupied, as set forth in article 3 of the agreement herein ratified, shall be reserved for school purposes, but the State of Idaho shall be entitled to indemnity for any lands so occupied: Provided, That none of said lands shall be disposed of under the town-site laws for less than $10 per acre: And provided further, That all of said lands within 5 miles of the boundary line of the town of Pocatella shall be sold at public auction, payable as aforesaid, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for not less than $10 per acre: And provided further, That any mineral lands within said 5-mile limit shall be disposed of under the mineral-land laws of the United States, excepting that the price of such mineral lands shall be fixed at $10 per acre instead of the price fixed by the said mineral-land laws."

Mr. PETTUS. I ask that the remainder of the bill be read.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is descriptive.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the words proposed to be stricken out by the committee.

Mr. DUBOIS. It is descriptive entirely.

Mr. PETTUS. If it is a description of the land, I do not care to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama withdraw his request?

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CLAY and Mr. BEVERIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not address the Chair, since the Senator from Georgia desires to present a measure.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to yield to me for just a minute.

Mr. QUAY. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

SAVANNAH RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CLAY. I ask that House bill 15445 be taken up and passed. It will not lead to discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia asks for the present consideration of a bill the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15445) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at Sand Bar Ferry, below the city of Augusta, Ga.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

Mr. CULBERSON and Mr. BEVERIDGE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. QUAY. I will in a moment. The Senator from Indiana has risen, intending to address the Chair.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know I have; but I did not observe when I rose that other Senators desired the attention of the Chair or the Senate for the passage of private bills, and of course I do not desire to interfere.

Mr. QUAY. I do not wish to interfere with Senators who desire to have private bills passed so long as they do not obstruct the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM]. I supposed possibly the Senator from Indiana intended to say something in relation to the statehood bill.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I did, Mr. President.

Mr. QUAY. If so, I trust the Senator from Texas will yield to the Senator from Indiana for a moment.

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, several Senators have expressed to me a desire to be absent from Thursday, as they are going home for the holidays; and it has occurred to me, and I so had a communication with the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the matter could not be hastened largely by keeping those Senators here on Thursday. Therefore I suggest that the further discussion of this measure, after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont, go over until immediately after the holidays.

Mr. QUAY. I have no objection whatever to that. I understand very distinctly that a number of Senators will leave the city to-morrow and that by Friday, at least, there will be no quorum here. With the understanding that the Senator from Vermont completes his remarks, that his speech shall be printed in the RECORD this week, and that on the 5th of January, when we meet, the Senator who is to succeed him on the side of the Committee on Territories will be ready to take the floor and proceed with the discussion, I will agree to the suggestion, if that is satisfactory to the Senator from Indiana and gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, Mr. President.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, that will be satisfactory to us if we can not get a quorum after Thursday. We should like to go on with the bill, and of course we want a day set when it is to be resumed. We do not want it to lose its place, as a matter of course.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly not.

Mr. QUAY. The consideration of the bill will be resumed in its order, as I understand, on the 5th of January, when the session is resumed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, and the discussion will be taken up again immediately on the 5th of January. The only effect of this agreement, as I understand, will be that there shall be no further discussion on Thursday.

Mr. QUAY. Provided the Senator from Vermont concludes his speech to-day.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Provided the Senator from Vermont concludes to-day, and that his speech shall appear in the RECORD before the holiday adjournment.

Mr. QUAY. It is also part of the agreement that a representative of the Committee on Territories will be ready to proceed with the discussion on the day we meet.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly; and that when we meet the discussion shall proceed on the part of the committee as it otherwise would on Thursday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] asks unanimous consent that it be agreed that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] who is now in possession of the floor, that further debate upon the statehood bill shall be deferred until 2 o'clock on the 5th day of January, when some member of the Committee on Territories will take the floor.

Mr. BATE. And proceed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And address the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. QUAY. The bill, of course, retains its place as unfinished business, Mr. President?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh, certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands. Is there objection to this request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS AT FORT WORTH, TEX.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House bill 15140.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would state to the Senator from Texas that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] is in possession of the floor.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Vermont has kindly yielded to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15140) providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, on the first Monday in November in each year.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OMNIBUS STATEHOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12543) to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, I now propose to take up the question of the conditions existing in Arizona with reference to her fitness for admission into the Union at this time. I wish, first, to call attention to the fact that Arizona is a Territory that is 378 miles in breadth and 379 miles in length, that it contains about 73,000,000 acres of land, that it is in the arid region of the country, that the southern portion of it is in the semitropical region of the country, but that yet in this large area there is a population, according to the census, of only 122,139 souls, or, to make that fact more impressive, there is $1\frac{1}{10}$ persons to each square mile in the Territory.

There are a number of fine towns in the Territory, very largely American in their character. The city of Prescott, which is reached after leaving the main trunk line passing through the northern section of the Territory as you travel south, is a town having a population, according to the census, of 3,559. More is claimed for it now, and doubtless there are a greater number of people there. It is a town that is sustained entirely by the mining interests around it—a town that is given up very largely to trade. It is well built, fine in its appearance, has an intelligent, well-educated, and progressive population, with good schools, good banks, and good institutions generally.

Passing south from there, after crossing the mountain, one comes to the city of Phoenix. A more delightful winter residence it would be difficult to find in this country. It is some four or five thousand feet lower in altitude than Prescott. The summers are intensely hot, we are told, but in winter there is perpetual sunshine and the temperature is such that the city becomes a gathering place for those who are delicate in health, particularly those suffering from lung diseases. At Phoenix they have the finest system of irrigation that can be found in the Southwestern Territories.

The country around the city is substantially level, so nearly so that they are able to bring the water of the river a good many miles, and, by ditching, to carry it to the fields needing irrigation. They have made such a success of the system that Phoenix is noted among all persons who have given attention to the subject of irrigation. I think it is conceded that the system there is more perfect than in any other place in the Southwest. We were driven through the outlying districts and found fine crops, fine herds, and attractive farms, and all the fruits naturally produced in the Temperate Zone and even in tropical countries are there grown in abundance.

The population of Phoenix is to a considerable extent made up of people who have gone from other sections of the country, perhaps originally in pursuit of health, but who have now entered into business and are interested in Phoenix and in the Territory in which Phoenix is situated. This class of population for intelligence, for education, for culture, can hardly be excelled in any city of its size in the Middle West or in the East.

Tucson, a city to which the census gives a population of 7,531, is more of the Mexican or Spanish type of a town. It has a larger population of the class known as Mexican. Here is situated the university, a prosperous institution, finely officered and cared for; and the population there we may refer to as we have to that in the other cities just mentioned. There are other towns in the Territory of like character, few in number and less in population, which I shall not take time to mention.

There are other communities in the Territory of a different type. One of them is the city of Bisbee. They call it a camp, because it is built up around the copper mines located at that place. The mining and smelting of copper has created the town and gives it its activity to-day. They claim a population of from 7,000 to 9,000, while the census gives a smaller number; but that can not be relied upon, because when the census was taken Bisbee was not an incorporated town. It is situated in a great ravine in the mountains. The population is just what one would expect in such a place. A portion are highly educated and cultured men; others, noted for their business ability, are engaged with them in the management of the works. Below them are superintendents and employees of different classes usually found in such plants. There are also settlements in connection with the Clifton mines, the Shannon mines, and the Commonwealth mines.

Tombstone was formerly a city, it is said, of 12,000 inhabitants, but a few years ago disaster overcame her, and at the present time it is said there are not over 1,200 people residing there;

although in fairness it should be stated that parties are now undertaking to remove the water from the mines, which had been flooded for years, and to attempt again to explore the lower levels to ascertain what may be found. But taking the population of the Territory as a whole, as it exists in city and in country, it will be found that 24,233, or 19.7 per cent, of them are foreign born and 50,308, or 40.9 per cent, of them are of foreign parentage. Looking at the population from a racial standpoint, we find that about 29,000 out of 122,000 are of Mexican origin, and 14,000 of the latter class were born in old Mexico and have come into Arizona as immigrants.

In Phoenix one of the gentlemen appointed to present the claims of Arizona for statehood, upon being interrogated as to the per cent of illiteracy in the Territory, stated that he had not the figures before him, but, knowing the Territory pretty well, he would think that it would range from 4 to 8 per cent in the different sections of the Territory; that perhaps it would average between those two numbers.

I can readily understand how he made such a mistake, as he came from the North, had only been four or five years in the Territory, and his residence had been in the delightful society of Phoenix, but he was entirely wrong in his estimate, as the census shows that, taking the whole population together, 29 per cent are not able to read or write in any language, and if we were to make a test of those who could read and write the English language, the per cent, of course, would be very much greater than that.

It appears that 28,911, or about 23½ per cent, of the population of the Territory are unable to speak English. The seriousness of the condition there suggested by this fact lies in this, that outside of those villages—I call them villages, but they call them cities—there are those vast areas of country in which the population is so sparsely settled that there is difficulty in bringing the children together and getting them into school, although the laws of the Territory have provided for a very good school system.

There is another peculiarity in the population of Arizona, disclosed by the census, in the fact that the percentage of the male population above 15 years of age who are married is only 43.6, while in New Mexico it is 56.6; in Oklahoma, 56.1, in the Indian Territory, 55, and in Ohio, 56.4, showing that there must be a considerable number of the male population in Arizona who are of a transient character, going there to work in the mines or for other purposes, but who have not permanently settled and adopted the family life.

Education in that Territory has been provided for by the establishment at Tucson of the agricultural college, to which I have referred. The Territory has two normal schools, which are represented as doing good work, and they have in that whole Territory, large as I have described it to be, 275 school districts, in which there are 122 grammar schools and 320 primary schools, with 118 male teachers and 339 female teachers. Governor Brodie, a most candid man, states that on the whole the educational system is working admirably for the Territory and he hopes for good results from it.

There is in the northern part of the Territory a large body of timber, which has been substantially untouched down to the present time, to which I should perhaps call attention; and I do not know that I can better do so than by adopting the language of Governor Brodie in his statement to the committee, in which he says:

> In the high range of mountains extending through we have the largest single belt of pine timber in the United States in this Territory, that extends from the Grand Canyon into New Mexico, in the southeastern portion, about 60 to 80 miles in width and 300 miles in length. The greater portions of it have been included in the forest reservations and in the Indian reservations. That country must depend entirely upon grazing for its success in the portions outside of the timber land. There is very little mining up that way; some little up about the Grand Canyon.

The industries of the Territory are principally agriculture, herding, and mining. Agriculture in Arizona is absolutely dependent upon artificial irrigation. This is conceded by everybody who appeared before the committee, including Governor Brodie, who, however, called attention to the fact that in the extreme northern portion of the Territory, among the mountains and at an altitude, perhaps, of 6,000 feet above sea level, there are valleys where they have some summer rains and where forage crops are to some extent harvested. But outside of that the whole Territory may be included in the arid area.

It appeared to the committee that agriculture has now substantially reached its greatest development until steps are taken to impound the winter rainfall and the water of the floods whenever they may come. In other words, that the water of the streams as they flow season by season is now fully utilized.

I have already referred to the very fine system of irrigation in and about Phoenix; but even at Phoenix they are now suffering severely from lack of water. They have an area which has been properly ditched and which at some time has been fully irrigated, which they can not avail themselves of because of the lack of water, particularly in the last two or three years, since the streams have been unusually low. Mr. Fowler, of Phoenix, who appeared before us for the Territory of Arizona, in referring to conditions there, said:

> I want first to emphasize to the committee the fact that when you talk about 275,000 acres of land on the canals, that all of that land practically, there may be a little—there may be 250,000 acres—that takes out some blocks that have been abandoned, but all of that 250,000 acres has been operated. The water has been over it. This last year we did not irrigate in this valley exceeding 90,000 acres. Over 90,000, I told you, to 100,000 acres. In fact, Mr. Heard thinks it was even less than that on account of the drought. I have 280 acres of land I did not put any water at all on, because I did not have it.
> I have avoided, gentlemen, a number of things that I would have said to you individually, because they were personal references. I feel delicate about going into the matter of making personal references.
> PROPORTION OF RANCH ACTUALLY IRRIGATED.
> In the case in which I was talking to the chairman, about my ranch of 340 acres, there are 280 acres that I have not put any water on for three years, and 140 acres, about that, out of which I have had water enough to cultivate about 40 acres, although I have spread out over more territory than that. I had quite a considerable acreage of oranges and grapes, and I wanted to save them, but I lost them in spite of everything I could do.
> Q. I understand that the reason you did not put more than this 40 acres under water was because of lack of water.
> A. Yes, sir; I did not put more than 40 acres under water because I lacked the water, but I was paying for 160 acres of water. The contracts are worded that the waters are to be furnished provided it is in the river.

Referring to that same subject, Professor Newell, connected with the Geological Survey, who has had charge of the work in Arizona and New Mexico, says:

> The condition at Phoenix is extremely serious, as the land under cultivation exceeds in area the available supply of water. For the last two or three years there has not been sufficient water for more than half or two-thirds of the land which has been normally under cultivation.
> The CHAIRMAN. Is that because there is not enough water in the river?
> Mr. NEWELL. It is because of the shrinkage of the river during the past few years.

Mr. President, I do not make these references for the purpose of casting any discredit upon Phoenix, but simply to call attention to the fact that in the natural flow of the rivers in that Territory, in my judgment, there can not be any better or further results hoped for than have already been accomplished. I am glad to say for Phoenix, and for what I believe to be her future, that the Committee on Territories of this body have already recommended favorably the passage of a measure asked for by the citizens of that city, authorizing the county of Maricopa, in which that city is situated, to bond itself to the extent of perhaps two millions or two millions and a half of dollars for the purpose of going 25 miles into the mountains and there constructing a dam and creating a great reservoir for the storage of water, which, if done, will, in my opinion and I think in the opinion of the committee, furnish an ample supply for the plain about Phoenix, not only for the area now under irrigation and which is properly ditched, but, as Governor Brodie suggested, to very nearly double that amount.

There is also another scheme, which the people there hope to induce the Government to adopt under the law which was passed last winter, for the storage of large quantities of water for use in that valley; and I expect at some time to see those schemes carried out.

Other sections of Arizona are irrigated, particularly in the valley of the Gila and the land near Yuma in the valley of the Colorado; but the amount of land irrigated in Arizona compared with the whole is almost infinitesimally small.

If the Senators who are interested in this question will take the trouble to turn to the map of Arizona, which is bound with the testimony reported by the committee, they will notice the black spots which indicate the area that is really irrigated, and they will see how utterly impossible it is, with the water already used up, to leave the valleys where irrigation now exists and to spread over any very considerable portion of the territory beyond.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly; I yield for a question.

Mr. BURTON. Is that condition because of the contour of the country or because of the want of water?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Both, I should say.

Mr. BURTON. Do you mean that if they had the water there is no land there to put it on?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I mean if they had water enough for that vast territory that it would be utterly impossible to carry it over the uneven surface, unless it was carried in pipes under a very comprehensive system, such as has not been adopted in any part of this country. But I mean, further, that the testimony of all persons appearing before the committee indicated that irrigation can not be extended any considerable distance from the streams of the Territory, water having to be carried by gravity in ditches.

Mr. Newell testified in relation to this matter. I think his testimony will be found on page 178 of the bound volume, when the map which has been bound was exhibited to him. The colloquy between the chairman and Mr. Newell was as follows:

The CHAIRMAN. As to irrigation, please describe the condition of the rest of the Territory with reference to the occupation of agriculture outside of the black area shown on the map.

Mr. NEWELL. Outside of the black area there are practically no lands susceptible of irrigation, except in the contingency of very extensive storage in the future.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state, if you can, roughly speaking, what proportion the lands under irrigation bear to the entire area of the Territory?

Mr. NEWELL. It is probably about a fourth of 1 per cent. I can correct that statement later, but it is less than 1 per cent.

The correction that the professor furnished later has been printed in brackets, and it shows that the total area of Arizona Territory is 72,268,800 acres, of which there were irrigated in 1899, 185,396 acres, or twenty-five one-hundredths of 1 per cent of all the land in the Territory.

He testified further:

The CHAIRMAN. It is less than in New Mexico, is it?

Mr. NEWELL. It is somewhat less than in New Mexico.

Senator HEITFELD. Have the lands all been surveyed in those Territories?

Mr. NEWELL. It has not all been surveyed and subdivided. The maps show the extent to which subdivision has progressed.

Senator HEITFELD. How do you get all your detailed information if there have been no surveys made? Have parties been sent out there to investigate and segregate the lands and to ascertain these things?

Mr. NEWELL. Lands can not pass out of the ownership of the Government unless they have been surveyed. This represents lands actually disposed of.

That, I think, presents accurately the condition of Arizona today, with an irrigated area aggregating 0.25 of 1 per cent of the entire land of the Territory.

I now wish, for purposes of comparison and to show what the resources of Arizona are from an agricultural standpoint, to call attention to the farm area of the Territory; and in order that there may be no mistake as to what is included in farm area in the census reports, I shall read from a note printed in the reports, as follows:

Under the general title "Farms" are included not only such tracts of tilled and untilled land as are commonly designated by that word in the older settled States, but also the ranches of the owners of flocks and of herds. Of the latter there are many in Arizona. The proprietors of some of these ranches own large tracts of land upon which cattle and sheep are fed, while others who own little or no farm lands subsist their flocks and herds, often exclusively, upon the public domain or range. The land and agricultural resources of such ranges are classed as farms when of sufficient importance to require in their management the continued labor of one or more persons.

Under that definition, as I understand it, the total farm area of Arizona is 1,935,327 acres. That only a small portion of this has been brought under actual cultivation is shown by the fact that the improved farm area of Arizona is 254,521 acres, and that of this there are 185,396 irrigated.

That the Senate may understand how small is the improved farm area of Arizona as compared with that in other Territories and States, I call attention to the fact that the improved farm area of Oklahoma, which has been occupied only ten or twelve years, is 5,511,994, or about twenty-one times as much as Arizona contains, and I believe her government was organized in 1863. The Indian Territory has an improved farm area of 3,062,193 acres, or twelve times as great as that of Arizona, and Oklahoma and Indian Territory combined have such an area thirty-three times as large as that of Arizona. To make it yet more perfectly understood, Connecticut has four times as much improved farm area as Arizona; Massachusetts has five times as much; Vermont has eight times as much; Kansas has an improved farm area amounting to 25,040,550 acres, ninety times as much as Arizona.

I have called attention to these figures simply to demonstrate what I believe to be the fact, that with the introduction of the best artificial system of irrigation which can be devised, with the storage of all the waters that can be impounded in the mountains, it will be impossible ever to irrigate any sufficient portion of Arizona to make it comparatively important from an agricultural standpoint.

To carry this thought a little further, I beg to call the attention of the Senate to certain comparisons suggested by the census tables giving the value of farm products in different States and Territories, from which it appears that in 1890 the entire value of the farm products of Arizona was $6,997,097, while during the same year the farm products of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory amounted to $73,119,746, or more than ten times the value of those of Arizona. To make yet more clear the extent of agriculture in Arizona, let me say that the value of farm products of Massachusetts was six times greater than that of the farm products of Arizona; in Connecticut, four times; in Vermont, four and a half times; in Kansas, twenty-nine times; in Illinois, forty-nine times; in Minnesota, twenty-three times, and in each of the Dakotas nine times in value those of Arizona.

These comparisons simply serve to emphasize the proposition which I have already made, and with that I pass on to the question of mining, because it is from the mines of Arizona, in my judgment, that the wealth of that Territory must come. The committee in their report say:

MINING.

But the great occupation of the people of Arizona is mining, and the great resources of Arizona are its mineral deposits. In this much development has already occurred, and it is asserted that immense bodies of ore, notably copper and gold, exist in various portions of the Territory. (Testimony of Judge Sloan and others, pp. 123, 125, 126.)

As is the case in all mining communities, verification of these claims is uncertain and a matter for the future. All that can be taken into account is the present development. Of this the chief is the mining of copper, in the production of which Arizona stands third, Michigan and Montana alone being ahead of it. Of the copper mines, the Verde mines, belonging to Senator CLARK, of Montana; the Copper Queen, belonging to Phelps, Dodge & Co., of New York; the mines of the Shannon Copper Company; the Black Warrior Company's mines, and the properties of a great Scotch corporation are the principal. Of the gold mines, the Pierce mine, the Congress mine, and the Commonwealth mine are perhaps among the most remarkable.

The actual output at present is shown by the following table:

	1899.	1900.	1901.
Clay products	$101,954.00	$112,737.00
Raw clay		2,000.00
Copper	a15,966,583.20	a14,198,131.68
Gypsum
Lead
Marble		5,000.00	$300.00
Limestone	960.00	165.00	300.00
Sandstone	4,168.00	64,000.00	202,500.00
Gold	2,566,100.00	4,193,400.00	4,083,000.00
Silver		1,857,210.00	1,687,440.00
Total	a18,639,765.20	a20,432,643.68	6,066,526.00

a Estimated at 12 cents per pound.

The comparative value of the above is illustrated when it is borne in mind that at the same time Colorado, Montana, and California produced the following:

GOLD.

	1899.	1900.	1901.
California	$15,197,800	$15,816,200	$16,891,400
Colorado	25,982,800	28,829,400	27,693,500
Montana	4,760,100	4,698,000	4,744,100

SILVER.

	1899.a	1900.	1901.
California	$1,065,762	$583,668	$555,360
Colorado	29,301,527	12,700,018	11,062,680
Montana	20,810,990	8,801,148	7,879,020

a Coining value; all other estimates at commercial value.

It appears from the table presented that the production of gold in Arizona in 1901 amounted to $4,083,000; the production of silver, $1,687,440. Comparing this with the production in other sections of the West, the production appears small. We find that in California there was produced four times as much gold as in Arizona, and in Colorado six times as much as in Arizona, and that Montana furnished fully as much as Arizona. We find also that Colorado produced six times as much silver as Arizona, and that Montana produced four times as much.

The product of gold and silver, even if it continues as great in the future as at present, can not alone, of course, be any basis for statehood, because in that year it amounted to only $5,777,440, and that, when compared with other products of other States, is not of large importance. It only equals the product of stone in Vermont; it does not half equal the production of stone in Pennsylvania. But whether that will be increased, and to what extent, is entirely problematical.

The committee visited the Congress mine, situated between Prescott and Phoenix, which has already reached a depth of about 3,000 feet, I think, and which is now producing gold in large quantities, we were told. It is the only gold mine we were able to visit.

But, coming to the record of the Territory in the production of copper, we find that in 1901 it produced 130,000,000 pounds. I have made a computation of its value, in which I have tried to be entirely fair. I have called it 16 cents a pound, and I think, perhaps, at that time copper may have commanded that price. But whether it was worth so much or less, that computation would show that the value of the output was worth that year about $20,800,000. If to that is added the value of the gold and silver produced, $5,770,440, and the farm products, to which I have already referred, amounting to $6,997,097, the product is $33,567,537. This is the output of Arizona in copper, her great product, in gold and silver, and in farm products.

What is that as a State's product when compared with the products of other political divisions of the country? I do not care to make an extravagant comparison, one that will belittle Arizona, because I do not stand here to say that there is not a future for that Territory. I hope there is; I am prepared to expect it; but it is not yet demonstrated, it is entirely problematical.

For the purpose of comparison let me say that in Vermont in 1900 the farm products alone were valued at $33,570,892, or as much as the entire product of Arizona in gold, silver, copper, and farm products, and I have said nothing of Vermont's manufactures or any of the other sources of her wealth. Massachusetts' farm products exceeded Arizona's product of metals and farm products, and the farm products of Kansas were six times as great; and the farm products of Illinois, not mentioning all other sources of her wealth, were ten times as great as the entire production of Arizona in the lines I have mentioned.

Carrying the comparison further, the farm products of Minnesota were five times as great, and of North Dakota and South Dakota twice as great.

The railroads of Arizona have their greatest mileage in the two lines which cross the Territory, one at the northern end of the Territory and the Southern Pacific, which passes through the southern portion of the Territory. I assume that mining has been somewhat handicapped, and held back by lack of railroad facilities in the interior, where it is extremely expensive to build roads. But of late there have been built, and there are to be built, doubtless, other roads, which will serve in their way to develop this industry. And if the Senators desire full information regarding the railroads of the Territory, present and prospective, I suggest that they read in this book of testimony the statement of Mr. Frank M. Murphy. It is very full, very complete, and is given by a man who has faith in the Territory and in the mineral deposits of the Territory, and whose faith is backed by his works.

Now, then, if it be true that that population is only what the census shows, or even what is claimed by the friends of statehood, namely, that the population may at this time reach 150,000—and the same claim that it would reach 150,000 was made thirteen years ago, when a similar measure was before Congress—and it does not appear to the Senate that there is that in the Territory which will serve to invite immigration to a large extent in the immediate future, certainly statehood can not be demanded upon that ground.

The future population of that Territory, in my judgment, rests entirely, and if not entirely, to a very large extent upon the question of the development of mines and what may be found in the mountains. It may be that the hope of the people of the Territory will be realized. If so, we will all be glad. But, if this hope is realized, then comes the other proposition, How long will its prosperity last? How long can the mines be worked and how long will they produce a revenue that would place the productiveness of the Territory upon a basis which would entitle it to be a State in this Union?

As I said before, this is entirely problematical. It is not capable of demonstration. It can not be known except as time reveals it. If at the end of fifty or a hundred years, we will say, because we believe that this Government will continue for all time, the mines should be worked out, what is there left in that Territory as a basis for statehood and to give her equal representation in this body?

But I do not propose to discuss that side of the question. I hope the development will come, and that it will come within a reasonable time. If it does, we can, in all good conscience, give cordial welcome to Arizona as a State in the Union. I am referring to this subject to call the attention of the Senate to the proposition that this is not a political question. It ought not to be a political question. It is a question of great public importance and great public policy as well.

We debate and determine other great measures the provisions of which affect the business of the nation and excite the interest of the whole people. If we make mistakes, we may modify those measures; we may repeal them. If we fail to give admission to Arizona at this time, it may be an error. If so, it is one that may be corrected when further development is had. If, on the other hand, we give her admission into the galaxy of States and in so doing we make a mistake, it is a mistake that will last just as long as the Government of the United States lasts; and, therefore, I insist that it is a question which we ought to examine carefully, critically, conscientiously, and determine correctly.

Now, in contrast to the slow development there has been both in New Mexico and in Arizona, and as showing that Territorial government is no hindrance to progress, because that has been urged before this body as a reason why these Territories should be admitted, and the claim has also been made that if admitted those Territories would bound forward in wealth and in population and in industries as many of the Northern Central States have done. To show, I say, that Territorial government does not materially affect the problem of development I call attention as an illustration of that assumption to the Territory of Oklahoma.

It was opened by proclamation of the President for the first time on the 22d of April, 1889, thirteen years ago. The Government land in that Territory was taken in an hour. Why was it taken in an hour, and why has the movement of population into Arizona and New Mexico and the occupation of Government lands been so slow? It was taken in an hour because the Territory of Oklahoma had soil of wonderful fertility, but it had with that soil the early and the later rains falling upon it, and it attracted the intelligent, the aggressive, the enterprising American element of this nation who wanted to make homes, and they went in there in such numbers that the Territory was crowded at once.

It appears that there was no provision made for the government of the people so crowding in. The 70,000 people in that Territory had to make a government for themselves. They did this and it existed until the next May—May 1, 1890—when they were able to organize a Territorial government under the authority of an act of Congress. They got along, the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] suggests to me, just as well without it. Yes; and why? Because the men who went in there were men of Anglo-Saxon blood, of American training, with business habits; with the instinct and the ability for self-government. They carried themselves magnificently.

Since that time there have been added several sections to that Territory—the Kiowa Reservation, the Potawatomi, and the Fox, and one other, whose name I do not remember. History shows that as those additional reservations were opened population again poured in like a flood. It was comparatively so when the Cheyenne and Arapaho districts were added, though not so rapidly, because those districts are farther west and nearer the arid region. But when the Cherokee Strip was opened there was again a grand rush from the Central West, and that section was substantially taken up in a day. There are now included in the boundaries of Oklahoma Territory about 2,000,000 acres of land which are Indian reservations.

The area of Oklahoma just about equals that of the State of Ohio. The census of 1900 gave it a population of nearly 400,000—to be exact 398,000. At that time, at the end of ten years of occupation, the population was more than double the entire population of New Mexico and Arizona combined.

It appears by the reports of the county assessors of taxes last made that the population had increased to over 540,000. Governor Ferguson gave it as his opinion that there were now in the Territory 600,000 people, and Delegate FLYNN, in his statement before the committee, said he would be willing to have the act of admission made conditional upon the fact that there are 600,000 people in the Territory. And of this vast body of people who have gone in there only 4 per cent are foreign born and only 5 per cent are illiterate.

The taxable property of Oklahoma, as assessed in 1902, is over $72,000,000, an increase of more than $12,000,000 in a single year. It has twenty cities of the first class; five of them were incorporated last year. Oklahoma City, by the census of 1900, contained a population of 10,037. By a census made in 1902, under a Territorial act, it appears that it has doubled in the two years; and that the city of Guthrie, the capital of the Territory, which two years ago had a population of 10,000, now has a population of 17,000.

The committee visited both of those towns and were, I think, impressed with the conviction that it would be difficult to find many places of the same size either in the East or in the Central West where the business blocks, as a whole, are as good. We were driven through the residential portions and out into the suburbs and found the homes in those cities exceedingly good. They were attractive architecturally, well finished, and tastefully painted; the grounds were well kept, and in Oklahoma City asphalt pavements were being laid; there was a general air of thrift and activity and of growth and prosperity; we found also that the people were contented and happy.

The railroads have not waited for towns to bond themselves before going into Oklahoma. As the people have rushed into that Territory the railroads have gone with them. The magnificent soil, the abundant moisture, the crops that can be raised have attracted this population, and where the population has gone the railroads have followed, and the trains are crowded.

We saw as we traveled through that area great stacks of corn in the open air. We saw the wheat elevators at the railroad stations. We saw baled cotton also at the railroad stations in great quantities. The peculiarity of Oklahoma is that, situated as she is, she is capable of producing the crops usually raised in the great Central West and also the crops which are raised in the more extreme South. It is a marvelous Territory from an agricultural standpoint.

The people there are perfectly contented. They are not restive; they are not over anxious in respect of the question of statehood. It is a paradoxical statement, and yet I believe it to be true, that among the masses there statehood is very much desired and to some extent dreaded. Why? They have the same longing that all Americans have to be incorporated into and become a part of this great Union of States. They have the instincts and desires that men of their birth and training should have. They would like to vote for President of the United States.

On the other hand, they are so protected by the Harrison law, which prevents the extreme bonding of municipal corporations in aid of railroads and other public enterprises, that they feel that they are safe, and they do not know what a State legislature, with that restriction removed, might be induced to do under the manipulation of powerful corporations. As a whole they want statehood, and yet the thoughtful men of that Territory hesitate about it, just as the thoughtful men in New Mexico and Arizona hesitate about statehood, as we found frequently in common conversation, and for the same reason.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

Mr. BURTON. How much greater is the mileage of railways in Oklahoma than in New Mexico?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not know that it is any larger. There are two lines of railroad in New Mexico that are through lines, from the East to the West.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Transcontinental?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. They are transcontinental lines, and they constitute the great proportion of all the railroads of New Mexico.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator how many railways are in course of construction now in New Mexico?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am unable to give the number. It is contained in the testimony of Mr. Murphy, to which I have called attention. You will find it in the printed volume of the testimony.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator will permit another question, about what is the mileage that has been built within the last two years that is not transcontinental?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. In New Mexico?

Mr. BURTON. In New Mexico.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not carry the figures in my mind.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think I can probably give a little information to the Senator from Kansas on that subject.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I would be very glad to have the Senator from Indiana do so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There are two transcontinental lines. The Santa Fe, which runs across the Territory and branches out from Albuquerque to El Paso; also a branch to Pecos, Tex. In addition to that there is the projected line, partly built, partly graded, and most of it surveyed, starting from Santa Fe. That, I think, is intended to penetrate what is known as the timber country. That is the line which is referred to in the statement of the Delegate from the Territory before the committee, if the Senator will look at it. I think that is substantially all.

Mr. BURTON. I will ask the Senator if the Rock Island road has not built from El Paso through the Pecos Valley within the last eighteen months?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true. I had forgotten it. The Rock Island has been built from El Paso through Alamogordo and through the Territory into Oklahoma. That is correct. It connects at El Paso with the Southern Pacific. Then there is a line, the Southern Pacific again, if I remember, though I am not sure, connecting from Arizona with the Santa Fe at Las Cruces.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. One of the strongest reasons that was urged why New Mexico should be admitted was this: Ignoring the fact that the road last mentioned by the Senator from Indiana has been built through the Territory by the Rock Island Company, it was said there is another piece of road begun but not completed, the owners of which are from the North, and it was urged before the committee that they had not yet bonded their road because they did not want to take that action under Territorial government.

The committee were unable to see how there should be any greater difficulty in bonding the road under Territorial government than there would be under State government. But if the owners come asking the section through which the road passes to bond itself for the benefit of the road, then I can see why the owners should favor statehood. That is the reason why there is a conservative element in New Mexico who are opposed to statehood, fearing the results if the restrictions under the Harrison Act are removed, and a part of the fear so entertained grows out of the conditions referred to in the testimony of Mr. Hughes, which I have before cited.

As to the characteristics of the Mexican members of the Territorial legislature, there is a fear that they are not the class of men who have developed in them that individuality which you find in the average American citizen, which enables him to act independently, of his own volition, upon his own strength, and to be able to give a reason for his action.

Mr. TELLER. And you would keep them out until they reach that point.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The Senator from Colorado suggests that I intend to keep them out until they reach that point. If my vote will have anything to do about it, I will keep New Mexico out of the Union until under the operation of her school law now in force that result is attained which was mentioned by Martinez Amador, the old Mexican to whom I referred yesterday, who said that, in his judgment, the old class of Mexicans in that Territory were not now fitted for nor did they desire statehood, but that when their children should become educated, then they would be prepared to go along with it, and then they would favor statehood.

Mr. TELLER. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask the Senator from Vermont if he does not recognize that the characteristics which he says these people are lacking are not the result of education, but that they belong to the race, and upon that theory he is going to keep those Mexicans out through all time?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I do not think that. If the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator that when, from his own statement, they have had fifty years and have not made any progress toward this end there is little hope of their doing it in the future, and, to be frank, the opponents of statehood ought to say to us that they do not think they are fit for self-government. That is all there is about it.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In reply, let me suggest that no matter whose fault it may be—and I do not say whether it is the Government's fault or the Territory's fault—during that fifty years this class of people have not had the advantages which are suggested by my esteemed friend.

It appeared from the testimony of Mr. Hughes that it was in 1889 that the present school law was passed. The figures that were presented by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], showing that between 1880 and 1890 there was such a tremendous per cent of increase in the school attendance of New Mexico, was an unfair statement, not that he intended that it should be unfair, but it was unfair from the fact that previous to that time they had not had school facilities, and that they had to come in in great numbers when the schools were provided.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator mean between 1890 and 1900?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. No; between 1880 and 1890. The school law was passed in 1889, and children rushed in.

Mr. LODGE. The great increase occurred in 1890.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. In 1887 it was introduced, and that was my explanation; therefore it was not to the discredit of Eastern States that their increase in schools had not been as great, because in the East the children had always been in schools, whereas in New Mexico they had not.

Now, I have faith in the Mexican race. I am glad to say it. They are inert; they have not yet come into contact with the American race in such a way as to be leavened and quickened and to be brought into that condition of thought which is possessed by the average American citizen. But, on the other hand, when they shall have become educated, when through that education they come to mingle more commonly with the American people, when they cease to isolate themselves in their own villages and employ their own language and think their own old inherited thoughts, then it is, in my opinion, they will make a good class of citizens. So New Mexico has a future before her. I would be very sorry to be misunderstood upon that subject, and I am glad that my friend called my attention to it and gave me this opportunity to make an explanation.

But proceeding, Mr. President, with Oklahoma. I have called attention to her wonderful development and the reason for it. These reasons are shown even more clearly by the statistics gathered by the Census Office.

I do not hesitate to assert that a great development will come to a people, regardless of the fact that they live under a Territorial government rather than under a State government, provided the natural conditions exist upon which to base that development.

Take the total value of farm property, exclusive of stock, if you see fit. We find that in Arizona in 1900 it was $14,448,160; in New Mexico it was $22,040,424; in the Indian Territory, $50,802,920; and in Oklahoma, $130,514,250, and accumulated in ten years' time. In other words, Oklahoma's farms were eight and one-half times greater in value at the end of ten years than the value of the farms in Arizona after a period of Territorial government extending from 1863, and nearly six times greater than in New Mexico, and three times greater than the farm values in both New Mexico and Arizona combined. Even the Indian Territory's farm values, exclusive of stock, were three times greater than those in Arizona, and twice as great as those in New Mexico.

Take the improved farm lands in acreage. This furnishes another illustration of the proposition. In Arizona there are 254,521 acres; in New Mexico, 326,873 acres; in the Indian Territory, 3,062,193; in Oklahoma, 5,511,994 acres. In Oklahoma Territory and Indian Territory combined there were improved farm lands amounting to 8,574,187 acres. Or putting it in a comparative form, Oklahoma has twenty-one times as much improved farm lands as Arizona and nearly seventeen times as much as New Mexico. Take the two Territories of Oklahoma and Indian Territory together. They have thirty-three times as much improved farm area as Arizona, twenty-six times as much as New Mexico, and fourteen times as much as both Arizona and New Mexico combined.

Test this proposition by the value of the farm products, which in Arizona in 1900 were $6,997,097; in New Mexico, $10,155,215; in Indian Territory, $27,672,002; in Oklahoma, $45,447,774, and in the two Territories, Oklahoma and Indian Territory, combined $73,119,746; or, stated in another form, it appears that the value of Oklahoma's products are seven and one-half times greater in value than those of Arizona, and four and one-half times greater in value than those of New Mexico, and the combined farm products of Oklahoma and Indian Territories were in value ten times greater than Arizona's, seven times greater than New Mexico's, and more than four times greater than both.

Observe also the development of the Indian Territory under her adverse conditions, under Indian government, with the impossibility of the white man to secure title to land except in the town districts, I believe. With the 80,000 Indians in that Territory—and, as Delegate FLYNN explained to us, "not blanket Indians, but Indians as white as you and I"—with 80,000 Indians in the Territory, it appears that there are also about 320,000 white men and women.

Mr. SPOONER. Other white men and women.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Yes; other white men and women. So that the Indian population, however good it may be in that Territory, is less than one-third in number of the population of the Territory; and yet this great number of our fellow-citizens who have gone in there, attracted by the natural advantages of the Territory, have no Territorial form of government; they are in a most deplorable condition in respect of schools, highways, and in respect of everything enjoyed under either Territorial or State governments. Yet in that Territory, including the Indians, the per cent of illiterates is only 17.

Moreover, Governor Ferguson, a most considerate, careful man, while he probably himself favors statehood for Oklahoma alone, very frankly states that Oklahoma is purely an agricultural Territory; that she has nothing outside of her agriculture to depend upon, unless it is some deposits of cement in the western part of the Territory, which are said to be very valuable. On the other hand, he says in the Indian Territory they have magnificent bodies of coal, they have great forests, and they have all the other things aside from agriculture which would go well with the agriculture of Oklahoma in forming a State.

No comparison can be made between Oklahoma and the other two Territories either in respect of population, of wealth, of resources, or in prospect, as I believe, of future greatness. It does not seem to me that the claims of these respective Territories should be considered at the same time and under the provisions of the same bill.

Arizona and New Mexico have been to Congress rapping for admission over and over again, and it has been refused. This is the first time, as I understand it, that Oklahoma has made application. She comes here presenting a strong claim. Why she has linked these claims to those other Territories I do not know. But because this is an omnibus bill, containing provisions for the admission of the three Territories, it should not, in my judgment, lead us to treat them as a whole. The admission of a State into the Union of the States of this great nation is a matter of such prime importance that we should give the examination of the claims of each of these Territories that careful, that full, that considerate attention which they deserve.

Oklahoma has the elements I have already mentioned which will continue to attract immigration within her borders. I think it has been the universal history of every political body in our country that has had agriculture for its source of development that with agricultural developments manufactures have sprung up, large cities have been built, trade and commerce have followed, and prosperity has abounded. I look forward to the time when in Oklahoma there will also be a development in other lines than agriculture which shall place her in the front rank of States.

The committee, in making their report to the Senate, have referred to the complaints made by some of the advocates of statehood of what somebody has called the iniquity of Territorial government. I presume there have been Territories which, in the past, have had just cause for complaint. I want to say, however, that neither in New Mexico nor in Arizona did I hear a specific complaint in respect to the operation of the Territorial governments as now administered. If there is a more honest, a more fair-minded, a more capable man in Arizona than Governor Brodie, I did not meet him. He has been there over thirty years; he was in the Army, and as a young man fought Indians in Arizona; he is as thoroughly acquainted with the needs of that Territory as it is possible for a man to be. He is universally esteemed.

Careful inquiry was made as to the judiciary of the Territories, with the result that no complaints whatever were found with any of the judges; on the other hand, they were universally praised in respect of their ability, their candor, and their honesty.

The people have the same opportunity for the election of their Territorial legislature that they would have for a State legislature. So that, so far as they are materially concerned, it has not seemed to the committee that in those two Territories there would be any particular disadvantage experienced if they should continue a little longer under that form of government.

We appreciate the feeling of some of the people that it would be a satisfaction to vote for President of the United States and to be represented in this great legislative body; and we sincerely hope that in the early future the conditions will be such that we can, in fairness to the rest of the nation, admit those Territories as States and give them a warm welcome into the Union. But compared with the States which from time to time have been admitted, the percentage of their population is so low that the committee have included in their report a large number of comparisons intended to bring the attention of the Senate to the disproportionate influence and power which those Territories would have in this body were they to be admitted as States. It is not my purpose to read such comparisons. They are before the Senate. There are a large number of them. But simply as an illustration of the thought I have in mind I read what the committee say in relation to Philadelphia and Pennsylvania:

> Philadelphia alone would make six States as large as New Mexico—

That is, in population—

> so that if we do not utterly abandon the idea of government by population instead of a government by square miles a citizen of New Mexico would have six times the voting power in the Senate of the United States that a citizen of Pennsylvania would, even were Pennsylvania confined entirely to the limits of Philadelphia alone.
> Philadelphia would make more than ten States as large as Arizona, so that the citizen of Arizona would have in the Senate of the United States nearly eleven times the voting power of the citizen of Pennsylvania were Pennsylvania confined to the limits of Philadelphia alone, and Philadelphia would make four States as large as New Mexico and Arizona put together.

The committee in their report further say:

> These illustrations are, of course, not given to prove that there should be an equality of population in all of the States, but to demonstrate the reasonableness of the proposition that a new State must have a population bearing some just proportion to the population of the nation as a whole; and they illustrate the serious disparity in power in national legislation between the remainder of the nation and these two Territories, mighty in area, but scanty in people.
> They emphasize the inherent injustice to the remainder of the nation involved in placing the policies of the country, both foreign and domestic, and the destiny of the Republic for all time to come, in the hands of so small a number of fellow-citizens, even though every individual in these Territories were the finest possible type mentally, morally, and in the educational qualifications.
> How much greater is the force of these considerations when to them are added the alien speech of the great majority of the people of New Mexico and many of the people of Arizona, and the high rate of illiteracy, diminishing though that illiteracy may happily be.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I can only repeat what I have said before, that this is not and should not be treated as a political question. It is one of national importance. No mistake, far-reaching in its effects, should be made. The action of this body should be conservative, cautious, wise. While it should be just to those seeking admission, it should be equally just toward the States and the nation.

For the reasons outlined in these remarks I have joined in the report made by the committee, and shall feel it my duty to vote for the admission of Oklahoma, but against the admission of Arizona and New Mexico at this time.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire to submit a few remarks and considerations why the bill for the admission of these three Territories as States ought not to be passed.

Mr. TELLER. Before the Senator does that, may I make an inquiry?

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I have been told that there was some arrangement made by which this discussion is to cease with to-day. Is that the fact?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was the understanding that immediately upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] there would be no further discussion of this measure until Monday, the 5th day of January, and I expected that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] would go on then. Perhaps he may be taking the floor now in order to have it at that time.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a word, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. NELSON. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say a few words on this bill before the holiday recess. I do not want to take very much time, but I do want to say something with reference to the character of the people of New Mexico. I think they have been, to speak mildly, slandered by the committee and slandered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], and I want, at least, having a pretty thorough acquaintance with that people, to say something about them, and I shall insist upon saying it either to-day or to-morrow or some other day before we adjourn. I do not think it is fair that the Senator should make a speech and then cut the rest of us off from dissenting from some of his statements and conclusions.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The President pro tempore was not in the chair when the unanimous consent was given. Will the Secretary please read it to the Senate?

The Secretary read as follows:

By unanimous consent it is agreed that upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] there shall be no further discussion of H. R. 12543, the omnibus statehood bill, until January 5, 1903, at 2 o'clock p. m., when some member of the Committee on Territories who has joined in the majority report shall be ready and shall proceed with the discussion of the bill. It is especially agreed that the remarks of the Senator from Vermont shall appear in some copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the present week.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is right. I do not know how the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] who has the floor might feel about it, but, so far as I am concerned, I should be glad to ask unanimous consent, in addition to the above agreement, that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] may proceed now with the discussion, the Senator from Minnesota to retain the floor, and the discussion to terminate with the remarks of the Senator from Colorado until after the recess, unless some member of the committee or some other Senator shall desire to make a short answer to that at this time. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done, if it be agreeable to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I see that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], who was a party to that unanimous-consent agreement and with whom it was made, is not present, and I shall feel compelled to object to any infringement of that unanimous-consent agreement unless he is present.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely ask unanimous consent as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Colorado. I am satisfied the Senator from Pennsylvania would not object to that, but if there is objection, of course that ends it, and the thing remains now, with the Senator from Minnesota, as I understand, having the floor, but not to proceed and nobody else to proceed with the discussion until January 5.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi. The Senator from Pennsylvania is very desirous to expedite the bill as much as possible. I am satisfied that if he were here he would be glad for the Senator from Minnesota to go on now, and after that for the Senator from Colorado to proceed, because those two speeches will then have been made before the Christmas holidays. So the bill would take that much less time after the holidays, and it would be expedited, a thing which is very much desired by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not think he would object to that if he were here. I am sure he would not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota can not, with propriety at any rate, go on with the discussion of the bill under the unanimous-consent agreement which has just been read to the Senate.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He can take the floor. I merely mean to make that as an inquiry of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that the Senator can take the floor and then surrender it, but the Chair would hold himself under obligation to recognize the Senator at the time named in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is satisfactory to us, Mr. President.

Mr. NELSON. I was out of the Chamber for a time, and therefore was not aware of the fact that this unanimous-consent agreement had been entered into. In view of that fact, of course I have no desire to proceed at this time. I have no desire to violate the rule thus adopted by the Senate, but I ask that I may have the privilege of taking the floor when this matter again comes up.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have never violated any of these arrangements which have been made and I do not intend to do so now; but if I had known what the arrangement was I certainly should have objected to it to-day, because I had it in mind at least that I should say a few words on this question, not on the merits of the bill, but in defense of several hundred thousand people in the United States of a certain nationality and race. That is all I desired. I did not desire to discuss the bill this afternoon, although I shall do that after the recess if I live to get back here. I simply wanted to say—and that is not discussing the bill—that I think the characterization of these people by the committee and by the Senator from Vermont is not supported by the facts. I say that after more than forty years' acquaintance with that class of people, both in Colorado and New Mexico. I want to repeat what I said yesterday—that they are good, loyal people.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I have been appealed to by certain Senators, and, so far as I am concerned, if my objection interferes with the further discussion of this matter I am willing to withdraw the objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] asks unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], notwithstanding the unanimous consent previously given, may now proceed to further discuss the question of the statehood bill. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With the further understanding that if any member of the committee or any Senator who agrees with the majority of the committee desires to do so this afternoon, he may briefly reply to the Senator from Colorado, and that thereupon, or in case no one desires to do so, upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Colorado, the original unanimous-consent agreement shall stand; that is to say, that there shall be no further discussion of the measure on either side until Monday, January 5, when some member of the committee will be prepared to proceed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana modifies his request, which now is that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] may proceed to discuss the statehood bill at the present time, and that any member of the committee so desiring may reply to him, and that that shall end further discussion until January 5. Is there objection?

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire under that arrangement what becomes of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], he having taken the floor to proceed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Unanimous consent having been given that there should be no further discussion of this bill until January 5, the Senator from Minnesota, being absent at the time that consent was given, and not knowing of it, rose to address the Senate, and was then reminded of the unanimous-consent agreement, immediately took his seat, and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] desired to reply to some strictures that had been made upon the character of the people of New Mexico, and he desired to do so at this time. That unanimous consent, of course, interposed there. Thereupon the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] asked unanimous consent that the Senator from Colorado might discuss the statehood bill at the present time, and that any member of the committee desiring to do so might reply——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Or any other Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Or anyone desiring to reply to the Senator from Colorado might do so, and that there shall be no further discussion than that until January 5. Is there objection?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. "Any other Senator," Mr. President. I distinctly said "any member of the committee or any other Senator agreeing with the majority."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes, that is true—agreeing with the majority.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, my understanding was not, when the unanimous-consent agreement of this morning was concluded, that it applied to a discussion of this bill. No unanimous-consent agreement, I think, can gag this Senate. The Senator from Colorado can make his speech on this bill or upon any pending measure in the Senate. Am I in error in that?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators sometimes do make speeches utterly regardless of the bill pending. [Laughter.]

Mr. QUAY. There is no difficulty about doing that. Any Senator can make his speech upon any question or any bill pending in the Senate. That is well established by the precedents of the Senate. The unanimous-consent agreement was that the bill should go over.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The unanimous-consent agreement is correctly stated, according to my recollection, by the record read by the Secretary; which is that after the Senator from Vermont had to-day concluded his speech then the further discussion of the measure should cease until January 5, when some member of the committee would be prepared to proceed, taking up the discussion at that time. That unanimous consent was given and has been read to the Senate in the absence of the Senator from Pennsylvania, as stated.

Mr. QUAY. I did not hear it. It was a mistake, then.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That was the way I understood it.

Mr. QUAY. My intention was that the bill should go over—that it should not be forced upon the Senate and compel Senators to discuss it if they were not prepared to go on. That was all.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I know there are a great many Senators who desire to leave the city——

Mr. QUAY. Therefore the bill should go over, coming up in its regular order on the 5th of January, at which time some member of the majority of the Committee on Territories was to take the floor. That was my understanding.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will please again read the agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is no practical difference between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself, because I myself asked for unanimous consent to modify that agreement so as to let the Senator from Colorado proceed this afternoon.

Mr. QUAY. So far as I am concerned, I have no objection to any Senator proceeding to talk upon this bill from now until Saturday; but so far as the order binding the Senate down to the consideration of the bill every day at 2 o'clock is concerned, that is practically suspended until the 5th of January. That was all I intended when the agreement was made, and I think that was the language of the agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator can hear the agreement read. The agreement states it the way I understood it and the way I remember it.

Mr. QUAY. I shall be glad to hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will again read to the Senate the unanimous-consent agreement.

The Secretary read as follows:

By unanimous consent it is agreed that upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] there shall be no further discussion of H. R. 12543, the omnibus statehood bill, until January 5, 1903, at 2 o'clock p. m., when some member of the Committee on Territories who has joined in the majority report shall be ready and shall proceed with the discussion of the bill. It is especially agreed that the remarks of the Senator from Vermont shall appear in some copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the present week.

Mr. QUAY. That was not my understanding, Mr. President. My understanding of the agreement was simply that the bill should go over. I have no objection, if the Senator from Colorado and the Senator from Minnesota so desire to go on that they shall consume the balance of the week in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. WELLINGTON. There is no question about the fact that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE] is correct in his remembrance of the agreement. The agreement is correctly stated. It was that all discussion upon this bill should cease upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. QUAY. That was not my understanding of it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. There is practically no difference between the Senator from Pennsylvania and myself, because I have asked unanimous consent to modify the agreement to the extent that the Senator from Colorado, who desires to leave, may make his remarks upon this matter, and that, after he concludes, any member of the majority of the committee or any Senator agreeing with them may, if he so desires, briefly answer. Aside from that, the original agreement stands; that is to say, discussion then ends until January 5 on either side or by anybody.

Mr. SPOONER. "Briefly" is a pretty indefinite phrase to put in an agreement.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course I take "briefly" out; I withdraw that.

Mr. QUAY. I have certainly no objection to the Senator from Colorado proceeding or to the Senator from Minnesota proceeding; in fact, I should be very glad if the majority of the Committee on Territories would proceed this week until they exhaust the debate, but they are not going to do so.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, we are all agreed that we have a consent agreement; it has been read, and it provides that there shall be no further discussion of this bill until Janury 5, when we meet after the vacation. It is proposed that we modify it. This is the first time since I have been in the Senate that I have known an effort to be made to modify a unanimous-consent agreement such as we have entered into.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. It is the first time I have heard of it since I have been here.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. FORAKER. I challenge any Senator to find in the RECORD any instance where we have set aside a unanimous-consent agreement. It may have been done.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not ask to set it aside; on the contrary, I expect to stand by it, but I made the suggestion as a matter of courtesy to the Senator from Colorado, to afford him an opportunity to speak.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to cut the Senator from Colorado off. I am in entire sympathy with what the Senator from Colorado wants to say, but at the same time I do not want this consent agreement violated. I do not think we shall accomplish any good purpose by doing so.

Mr. TELLER. It will not be violated so far as I am concerned.

Mr. FORAKER. I am sure it will not be.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I withdraw my request.

Mr. FORAKER. But I do not want the agreement set aside. I think, having made it, we ought to adhere to it. We made it intelligently. Every Senator who was in the Chamber at the time knew we were making that kind of an agreement; the agreement was stated at the desk, and if there was anyone disposed to object to it that was the time to make the objection.

I think it is idle to make unanimous-consent agreements if, when anyone sees fit to make such a request, we are going to modify or set aside or disregard them, because the moment a unanimous-consent agreement is made all Senators conform to that as the programme that has been marked out. I do not know how many Senators, or whether any at all, have left upon the theory that there would be no more discussion of this bill; but probably there have been some, and they would have a right to complain. Every Senator who is absent now and who was present in the Chamber when the agreement was made, and participated in making it, would have a right to complain of us if we should see fit in his absence, without any notice to him, to enter into an agreement of a different kind.

I should be very glad to hear the Senator from Colorado, but we can hear him, I think, without any injury to the cause, on the particular point to which he now wishes to address himself when he comes to discuss the bill. We shall then have his speech altogether. I object to any modification of the agreement.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I am not going to ask any favors of the Senate. There has been no member of this body during the last twenty-five years or more who has been more insistent upon maintaining these unanimous-consent agreements than myself; but when the Senator from Ohio says that they have never been modified, he is not acquainted with the history of the discussions of this Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not say they had never been modified; but only since I have been here.

Mr. TELLER. There have been repeated modifications. There can no harm come in a modification when every Senator agrees to it. When the power is reserved for one Senator to object, there will never be any modifications that will cause any distress or any fair criticism.

Now, I can, without any question—and nobody could prevent me—take the floor and make a speech on this question: but I know that the business of the Senate can not be conducted properly unless we stand by these unanimous-consent agreements. I did not know, of course, of this agreement until I took the floor. I was told of it just a few minutes ago. I am not, however, now going to debate the bill. What I wanted to say, I think, would hardly come within the rule of debating the bill, nor would it require anybody, unless it might be some member of the committee, to reply to me, and that he could do if he saw fit. Of course, the matter may go now; but I regret to say that I have not had an opportunity to make a proper defense of a very respectable number of my constituents, which I will do after the recess, if I live to get back here. I shall then pay attention to what I think is a gross and most uncalled-for slander of a large part of the population in my portion of the country.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 4825) providing for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bill and joint resolution; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 12370) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians in the State of New York, and extend the protection of the laws of the United States and of the State of New York over such Indians, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. 4572) to grant honorable discharge from the military service to Charles H. Hawley;

A bill (S. 4067) granting an increase of pension to Julia L. Gordon; and

A bill (H. R. 619) providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and twenty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 12270) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians in the State of New York, and extend the protection of the laws of the United States and of the State of New York over such Indians, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

UNION RAILROAD STATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4825) providing for a union station in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. DILLINGHAM, and Mr. MARTIN were appointed.

PAY OF EMPLOYEES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask unanimous consent that, without being referred, the joint resolution may be considered and put upon its passage at this time.

The joint resolution was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 17, 1902, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, December 16, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LOCK AND DAM IN BAYOU VERMILION, LOUISIANA.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15605) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion, in the State of Louisiana; which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a lock or locks and a dam near the mouth of Bayou Vermilion or at some suitable point in said bayou: Provided, That said lock or locks and a dam shall be constructed and paid for by said association. The examination and surveys for the construction of said lock or locks and a dam, and the construction of the same, shall be subject to the supervision of the United States engineers and done in accordance with plans and specifications to be furnished by said association and approved by the Secretary of War. The work on said lock or locks and a dam may commence as soon as said association shall judge proper after the survey provided for above shall have been made and plans and specifications for said lock or locks and a dam shall have been approved by the Secretary of War. The maintenance of said lock or locks and a dam shall devolve on said association, which shall at all times keep same in proper condition and so as not to interfere with the free navigation of said bayou; nor shall said association at any time impose any toll for the passage of any craft through said lock or locks.

The following committee amendments were read:

Add in line 6 of the first page, after the words "said bayou," the words "to be approved by the Secretary of War."

Add at the end of section 1 the following: "Provided further, That such suitable fishways as may be prescribed by the United States Fish and Fisheries Commission shall be provided in the said dam by the said association."

Add, as section 2, the following: "That this act shall be null and void unless the privilege hereby granted shall be availed of within two years from the date hereof."

Add, as section 3, the following: "That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has reported? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BROUSSARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RESURVEY OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE STATE OF WYOMING.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4617) to authorize a resurvey of certain lands in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be made a resurvey of the following townships in the State of Wyoming: Townships 49, 50, 51, and 52 north, ranges 97, 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 103, and 104 west, of the sixth principal meridian; townships 53, 54, 55, and 56 north, ranges 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, and 100 west, of the sixth principal meridian. And all rules and regulations of the Department of the Interior requiring petitions from all settlers on said lands asking for a resurvey and an agreement to abide by the result of the survey, so far as these lands are concerned, are hereby abrogated: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to impair the present bona fide rights or claim of any actual occupant of any of said lands so occupied to the amount of land to which, under the law, he is entitled.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Public Lands, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On line 6, page 1, after the word "ranges," insert the words "ninety-three, ninety-four, ninety-five, and ninety-six."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know the purpose of this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, under the present regulations of the General Land Office it is necessary where resurveys are desired to obtain the consent in writing of all owners and claimants to all of the lands involved. At times it is practically impossible to do this. Under the regulations of the Land Office it is impossible that any holder or owner of land shall be in any way injured, as his lands are first surveyed, lines run out, and then the general lines of survey extended. The Department, in my opinion, has authority to waive its own regulations, but it prefers not to do so, and recommends this legislation in order that these surveys which are much needed and desired by the settlers may be had.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I will inquire whether the amendment which the gentleman offered, including some ranges, adds anything additional to that recommended by the committee?

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment adds to the bill four townships.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Those are the townships that we authorized. I did not remember that the amendment was in the words read. I just want to know whether it added anything over and above what the committee authorized in the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. That amendment was authorized by the committee at its last meeting, including four additional townships.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And those are the four which the gentleman adds?

Mr. MONDELL. Those are the four.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that it is the unanimous report of the Committee on Public Lands, and I see no objection whatever.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming, by direction of his committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LOCK AND DAM IN MERMENTAU RIVER, LOUISIANA.

Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 15606) to authorize and empower the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association, of the State of Louisiana, be, and is hereby, authorized to construct a lock or locks and a dam near the mouth of Mermenteau River or at some suitable point in said river: Provided, That said lock or locks and a dam shall be constructed and paid for by said association. The examination and surveys for the construction of said lock or locks and a dam, and the construction of the same, shall be subject to the supervision of the United States engineers and done in accordance with plans and specifications to be furnished by said association and approved by the Secretary of War. The work on said lock or locks and a dam may commence as soon as said association shall judge proper after the survey provided for above shall have been made and plans and specifications for said lock or locks and a dam shall have been approved by the Secretary of War. The maintenance of said lock or locks and a dam shall devolve on said association, which shall at all times keep same in proper condition and so as not to interfere with the free navigation of said bayou; nor shall said association at any time impose any toll for the passage of any craft through said lock or locks.

The following committee amendments were read:

Strike out the letter "e" in the title in the last syllable of the word "Mermenteau," making the spelling "Mermentau;" also by making the same correction where the word occurs in line 5.

Add in line 6 of the first page, after the words "said river," the words "to be approved by the Secretary of War."

After the end of section 1 add the following:

"Provided further, That such suitable fishways as may be prescribed by the United States Commission of Fish and Fisheries shall be provided in the said dam by the said association."

Add as section 2 the following:

"SEC. 2. That this act shall be null and void unless the privilege hereby granted shall be availed of within two years from the date hereof."

Add as section 3 the following:

"SEC. 3. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DAVEY of Louisiana, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LIGHT-HOUSE AND FOG-SIGNAL STATION, MUKILTEO POINT, WASHINGTON.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 257) to establish a light-house and fog-signal station at Mukilteo Point, near the city of Everett, State of Washington.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a light-house and fog-signal station, together with suitable buildings, be established at Mukilteo Point, near the city of Everett, State of Washington, under direction of the Light-House Board; and that the sum of $22,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same hereby is, appropriated therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman if this is the usual form for a bill of this kind?

Mr. JONES of Washington. This is a Senate bill, and it is the usual form in which the Senate passes these bills.

Mr. PAYNE. The Committee on Appropriations generally object to these appropriations.

Mr. JONES of Washington. When these bills pass the Senate they usually pass in this form.

Mr. PAYNE. I am not a member of that committee, and therefore I shall not object.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. JONES of Washington, the corresponding House bill (H. R. 12000) was ordered to lie on the table.

DECEMBER SALARIES OF CONGRESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. BULL. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts and ask that it be considered.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and instructed to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives, including the Capitol police, their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. BULL. I move the passage of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that this resolution will require unanimous consent of the House for its consideration. It is not for a payment out of the contingent fund of the House, which is the crucial point.

Mr. BULL. Then I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution just read. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BULL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL EMPLOYEE, HOUSE BATHROOMS.

Mr. BULL, from the Committee on Accounts, also submitted the following adverse report, which was read by the Clerk:

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred House resolution No. 185, authorizing the Speaker to appoint some person especially qualified, who shall have the care and charge of the House bathing rooms, have had the same under consideration and recommend that it lie on the table, for the reason that the additional employee provided for in the resolution is not necessary or essential to the proper conduct of the bathing rooms of the House.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the report.

The report was concurred in.

LAUREAN ABBOTT, DECEASED.

Mr. BULL, from the Committee on Accounts, also submitted the following resolution, which was read by the Clerk:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House is hereby authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the House to James A. Abbott, father of J. Laurean Abbott, deceased, lately employed as a telephone operator in the House of Representatives, a sum equal to six months' pay at the rate of compensation ($75 per month) received by her at the time of her death, and a further sum, not exceeding $250, on account of expenses of her last illness and burial.

The following amendment was read:

In line 3, after the word "of," strike out the initial "J."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

CONTAGIOUS AND INFECTIOUS DISEASES OF LIVE STOCK.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up the regular order, which is the bill (H. R. 15992) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

The Chair will ask the gentleman if the bill has been read in the House? The Chair thinks it has been.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was read in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill by its title for the information of the House.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, if the House will give me its attention for a moment, I think I will be able to explain to it the needs of this bill. Members will notice that the power that was conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury under sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act for the establishment of a Bureau of Animal Industry" are hereby conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture, to be exercised exclusively by him. Now, that refers to the law establishing the Bureau of Animal Industry, which is chapter 60 of the laws of 1884, and the section reads in this way:

SEC. 4. That in order to promote the exportation of live stock from the United States the Commissioner of Agriculture shall make special investigation as to the existence of pleuro-pneumonia, or any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, along the dividing lines between the United States and foreign countries, and along the lines of transportation from all parts of the United States to ports from which live stock are exported, and make report of the results of such investigation to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall, from time to time, establish such regulations concerning the exportation and transportation of live stock as the results of said investigations may require.

Now, as I said, the bill simply proposes to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture a power which seems to lie in the Secretary of the Treasury—that power that was intended to be transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture when the Department of Agriculture was made an Executive Department. For some reason or other it was omitted or lost sight of entirely, and for the last ten or twelve years the Secretary of Agriculture has been exercising precisely that right, which has never been questioned until last fall, when a drove of cattle was brought up from Texas, and, getting to the Colorado line, they were met by a law of the State of Colorado which subjected them to an inspection by the local authorities, and the cost and all that sort of thing was charged against the cattle. Now, under section 5—

That to prevent the exportation from any port of the United States to any port in a foreign country of live stock affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and especially pleuro-pneumonia, the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to take such steps and adopt such measures, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, as he may deem necessary.

That power also has been absolutely exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture, and by him alone. Now, the first section of this bill is simply to rectify what was supposed to have been rectified ten or twelve years ago. The Secretary of the Treasury has no veterinarians or inspectors, and he can not do the work that is required without further legislation authorizing him to employ inspectors, veterinarians, etc. These people are now employed by the Secretary of Agriculture.

The second section of the bill is made necessary by the suspicion that this disease was introduced into New England through baled hay brought over with horses imported from the European Continent. At least, so far they have not been able to trace it to cattle or animals brought in from Europe. In a letter that I have from Dr. Salmon he tells me he thinks it was introduced through the medium of baled hay brought in with horses. There was probably an amount left over, which was sold to the stock yards at Brighton; that it found its way into the regular supply of the stock yards; that it was fed to the stock in the yards, and so the disease was started there. To cover this dangerous possibility the second section is made necessary.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to make such regulations and take such measures as he may deem proper to prevent the introduction or dissemination of the contagion of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease of animals from a foreign country into the United States or from one part of the United States to another, and to seize, quarantine, and dispose of any hay, straw, forage, or similar material or any meats, hides, or other animal products coming from an infected foreign country to the United States, or from one State or Territory or the District of Columbia in transit to another State or Territory or the District of Columbia, whenever in his judgment such action is advisable in order to guard against the introduction or spread of such contagion.

I think that explanation will show to you the need of that section of the bill.

Now, at the proper time I shall ask for an amendment to the title, as it no longer makes an appropriation; and I shall ask unanimous consent to strike from the bill sections 3 and 4, which are the sections making appropriation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair calls the attention of the gentleman to the fact that that was done at the time of making this special order. It is no longer a part of the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am glad of the parliamentary information. I did not know whether it required a motion to strike it out or not.

There is another amendment I will propose at the proper time. On line 24 on page 2 I shall ask to strike out the words "or may remain therein."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire action on this now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will make the parliamentary inquiry if this is the proper time?

The SPEAKER. This can be done at any time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then I will offer the amendment now.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, lines 24 and 25, strike out the words "or may remain therein."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I want to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. MADDOX. Ten minutes will do me and probably less.

The SPEAKER. How much time does the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield ten minutes.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from New York to line 12, page 3. This section reads:

That the Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to make such regulations and take such measures as he may deem proper to prevent the introduction or dissemination of the contagion of any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease of animals from a foreign country into the United States or from one part of the United States to another.

I offer an amendment to strike out the words "part of the United States" and insert the words "State or Territory;" so it will read: "From one State or Territory to another."

Mr. WADSWORTH. I really, Mr. Speaker, have no objection to that except the language used in that section is the language used in the original law of the Bureau of Animal Industry. It there says, "all parts of the United States." I think the language offered by the gentleman from Georgia covers the ground completely. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 2, in line 12, after the word "one," by striking out the words "part of the United States," and insert in lieu thereof the words "State or Territory or District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia require a vote upon the amendment now?

Mr. MADDOX. Just a few words, Mr. Speaker, and then I am through. When this matter was called up the other day it seemed to me that we had gone into hysterics over it, and after investigation I am satisfied that that is true. The Secretary of Agriculture has now a large sum of money on hand which he may use for this purpose. But after reading the examination that we had before the Appropriations Committee on this matter, I doubt whether there is any deficit or will be any, and the probability is there may not be any. There may be money enough on hand to do all that is required in this matter.

I stated frankly to the House then that I did not understand all these laws in regard to these matters, but it occurred to me at the time that this was simply an act for the purpose of appropriating money to go to one part of the United States to stamp out one particular disease, when there is disease all over the country in other directions which will kill a horse or cow just as dead as the foot-and-mouth disease. But after investigating the matter I find that that is under the general law that this appropriation is made and that it can be used for any purpose if our governors see fit to call on the officials to aid and abet. Therefore, with the amendment I have to offer, so far as the legislative part of it is concerned, the appropriation having already been made, I am in favor of the bill if the amendment is adopted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have the amendment again reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I think in line 12 the words "United States" should be preserved a second time, so that it will read "one State or Territory of the United States, or the District of Columbia."

Mr. MADDOX. Very well; I see no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia modifies his amendment accordingly.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding to section 2 the following:

"That in order to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the spread and ravages of the Mexican cotton-boll weevil and to devise methods, if possible, for the destruction and extirpation of the same, and prevent the spread thereof, the sum of $1,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. And such appropriation shall be available at once and until expended for the purposes herein provided. And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby instructed to immediately carry out the provisions of this section."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, against that I raise a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I would like to ask if any provision is being made in the general Agricultural appropriation bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is. In the last bill there was carried an appropriation of $20,000, and this year there will be a sufficient amount carried by the general appropriation bill.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. To what amount?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amount has not been settled upon, but probably as much as last year.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert at the end of section 1:

"Provided, That nothing herein shall be held to exempt such stock from the requirements of the laws and regulations of any State entered or through which it proceeds, or in any manner amend or abridge such State laws or regulations unless the shipment is continuous through such State and without unloading, except for rest or food: Provided further, That when such stock is being moved on foot or otherwise than on carriers it shall, before it enters any State, be subject to inspection and amenable to the laws of such State or States."

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee rose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not think that amendment is necessary at all. Still I am willing, of course, to hear what the gentleman from Tennessee has to say in favor of it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this bill is based in part upon a condition produced by an adjudication of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the recent case of Reed v. The State of Colorado, in which Reed was convicted for refusing to get a health certificate from the Colorado officials permitting him to ship his stock across Colorado to Wyoming. Reed claimed that the State had no power to act, as the Federal authorities had already given him a health certificate. He knowingly and willfully disobeyed the Colorado law.

This bill now is to give the Secretary of Agriculture complete power, regardless of State laws, to authorize the shipment of stock into and through any State or Territory regardless of the condition of the stock. The State and organized Territories are to be completely ignored. As the law is, they are not ignored. Congress up to this time has not assumed complete control of interstate commerce. This bill enacted into law will arm the Secretary of Agriculture with power to give a health certificate of stock, say in California, to be driven on foot overland or shipped in carriers from California to Maine, and regardless of whether the stock becomes diseased en route or not the States can not interfere to protect themselves. The States and Territories wherein they may become thus diseased are to be entirely ignored.

You can see, especially if the stock is being transported on foot and becomes diseased, that the States or organized Territories can not stop them. They are powerless to act, for Congress takes "entire" charge under this bill of the stock from start to finish, as shown by section 1 of this act, which provides as follows:

Whenever any inspector or assistant inspector of the Bureau of Animal Industry shall issue a certificate showing that such officer had inspected any cattle or other live stock which were about to be shipped, driven, or transported from such locality to another, as above stated, and had found them free from Texas or splenetic fever infection, pleuro-pneumonia, foot-and-mouth disease, or any other infectious, contagious, or communicable disease, such animals, so inspected and certified, may be shipped, driven, or transported from such place into and through any State or Territory, including the Indian Territory, and into and through the District of Columbia, or they may be exported from the United States without further inspection or the exaction of fees of any kind, except such as may at any time be ordered or exacted by the Secretary of Agriculture; and all such animals shall at all times be under the control and supervision of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Agricultural Department for the purposes of such inspection.

Note the concluding language: "And all such animals" (not simply the healthy ones, but "all," the diseased and well animals) "shall be under the control and supervision of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Agricultural Department for the purposes of such inspection."

If he—the Federal officer—fails to act, the States and Territories are powerless to act, because the "entire subject" is by this bill given over to the Federal authorities.

Clearly Congress takes, under this section, complete charge of such interstate and foreign commerce, and thus nullifies all State laws on the subject, as shown by the opinion of the court in the Reed case, which reads as follows:

It is quite true, as urged on behalf of the defendant, that the transportation of live stock from State to State is a branch of the interstate commerce, and that any specified rule or regulation in respect of such transportation, which Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize and which may properly be deemed a regulation of such commerce, is paramount throughout the Union. So that when the entire subject of the transportation of live stock from one State to another is taken under direct national supervision and a system devised by which diseased stock may be excluded from interstate commerce, all local or State regulations in respect of such matters and covering the same ground will cease to have any force, whether formally abrogated or not; and such rules and regulations as Congress may lawfully prescribe or authorize will alone control. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 210; Morgan v. Louisiana, 118 U. S., 455, 464; Hennington v. Georgia, 163 U. S., 299, 317; N. Y., N. H. and H. R. R. Co. v. New York, 165 U. S., 628, 631; Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railway Company v. Haber, 169 U. S., 613, 626; Rasmussen v. Idaho, 181 U. S., 198, 200.) The power which the States might thus exercise may in this way be suspended until national control is abandoned and the subject be thereby left under the police power of the States.

Again the court said:

Now, it is said that the defendant has a right under the Constitution of the United States to ship live stock from one State to another State. This will be conceded on all hands. But the defendant is not given by that instrument the right to introduce into a State, against its will, live stock affected by a contagious, infectious, or communicable disease, and whose presence in the State will or may be injurious to its domestic animals. The State—Congress not having assumed charge of the matter as involved in interstate commerce—may protect its people and their property against such dangers, taking care always that the means employed to that end do not go beyond the necessities of the case or unreasonably burden the exercise of privileges secured by the Constitution of the United States.

The Constitution itself does not deprive the States of the right to inspect interstate commerce detrimental to the public health. It is only when Congress takes "entire" and direct control of "interstate commerce" that the State laws are suspended and become inoperative.

The vital and serious question I have in mind is, Shall we empower Congress to take "entire" charge of interstate trade in live stock?

If we do, the State laws are suspended without more. Is it good policy, regardless of whether we have a good or bad Secretary of Agriculture, to enforce the law? And I want to say I think Mr. Secretary Wilson is the best officer we have ever had in that Bureau.

As the law is, the States aid the Federal Government, but under this bill they are made inoperative—stand "suspended" as to interstate commerce, and the States must depend on the one Federal officer, the Secretary of Agriculture and his agents to protect their property and people as against an officer and his agents in each of the 45 States, and the Secretary of Agriculture.

I am fully advised of the power Congress has to "prohibit," as the court said in the Addyston Pipe case, objectionable interstate commerce. The trouble here is, when Congress takes "entire" charge of interstate commerce to control or exclude the objectionable part, the State laws stand suspended and inoperative. And I say in this class of trade, diseased stock and the like, we should not let Congress take "entire" charge; and if we do, we should distinctly say that the State laws shall remain auxiliary at least to the Federal law. But under this bill they stand "suspended" and inoperative.

Congress does not undertake to simply "prohibit" this objectionable commerce, leaving State laws intact, but goes further and assumes "entire" control over the whole subject, thereby suspending all conflicting State laws.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask my friend from New York whether it is the intention of his committee by this provision to arm the Secretary of Agriculture with authority to give a health permit which shall protect from State authority and State regulation diseased stock passing through any State, a permit that shall be good regardless of State authority until the cattle reach the export point at New York?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I answer the gentleman, yes——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But if the gentleman will read the provision contained in the last few lines of section 1 he will find that in no instance, practically, are those cattle freed from governmental inspection while in transit. They may be shipped from Texas to Denver, and thence to Kansas City, if you please; and though they may be unloaded at Denver or at any point between Denver and Kansas City, still they are under the inspection and care of the Government, and if any disease should break out among such cattle they are taken care of.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does the gentleman contend that we should empower any official to unload stock diseased upon the State of Colorado or any other State against the will of such State? But this bill suspending all State laws, Congress having taken "entire" charge of interstate stock trade, you can do as you please, it seems to me, and the States are helpless. I say that, whether my friend from New York or other friends of this measure so intend or not, this bill will absolutely paralyze every State law on this subject, and permit such stock to be carried into or through any city or county or State regardless of any attempted interference by the State authorities. Congress has never assumed to execute such a power before in such a business.

The State of Colorado said: "You shall not bring diseased or healthy cattle into this State until we examine them," and the court upheld the law; yet this bill, Mr. Speaker, whether intentionally or not, gives Congress the power to ignore the State, to ignore the health of the people in the State, to ignore and paralyze a power which the Supreme Court has said "the States never surrendered to Congress," but which becomes now inert and lifeless, it seems, simply because Congress has assumed "entire" control over the subject.

Mr. BURLESON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the entire contention of the gentleman is based upon the assumption that the Secretary of Agriculture will not do his duty, that he will give a certificate of a clean bill of health for diseased cattle? If he does not do that, then the gentleman has no complaint?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. No; not all. It is the impolicy of the law, even if Congress has the power to act, that I oppose. The gentleman from New York said just now, in explanation of this bill, that the Secretary of Agriculture could give a permit for cattle in the State of Texas to be driven on foot, and we all know that when cattle are brought from one section of the country to another, inherently and inevitably very often disease breaks out among them, and no one knows anything about it. Yet these cattle may start in Texas or Colorado and be driven on foot, under the terms of this proposed law, and thus spread disease, whether it be this foot-and-mouth trouble or any other contagion that flesh is heir to, destroying the cows of the country, the hogs and horses of the country, the health of the country, and the States are absolutely paralyzed in their efforts to defend themselves.

Mr. Speaker, whether Congress can do that or not, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] says that this bill undertakes to give him the power to do it. Surely, Mr. Speaker, if Congress has the power, it is not going to pass a law which will break down the power of the State to protect itself and thus put it into the hands of a man in Texas to get a permit and that permit continue to be the law of the country until the stock is shipped on board a boat for England from the city of New York.

Cattle may come from Arkansas and breed disease. They may go into Indiana and breed disease. Stock raised in Montana can not live South, and stock raised South can not live in Montana, and so in Texas and in New York; and yet the gentleman's bill will permit the Secretary of Agriculture to actually drive cattle from one end of this country to the other which may be reeking with disease. If hogs, they may have the cholera. If cows, they may not have feet or mouth because of disease. Yet to prevent this every State and Territorial law in the Republic, under this bill, is paralyzed.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would ask the gentleman in what respect this bill changes existing law?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will read the opinion he will see that it does change the law, and gives not only a power he did not have, nor any one in the Colorado case, but goes further and puts all interstate trade in stock in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. LAMB. It does not.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It does.

Mr. LAMB. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The law in Colorado was that before these particular cattle went through that State a permit must be granted by the authorities of the State. Under this bill, if made a law, the States will be legally ignored in the future.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is a matter of interstate commerce.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I have read the opinion in the Reed case and many others in point. Reed went across Colorado anyway. He refused to get or accept a State permit. He was indicted in Colorado and found guilty, and the supreme court of that State affirmed the decision about December 1—a few days ago. And this bill is to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to legally ignore the State authorities in such cases in the future.

Mr. WADSWORTH. One minute——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Just a minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend. The gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman in a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee will suspend. This debate must proceed in an orderly way. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] addressed the Chair and asked permission to put a question to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I yielded to the gentleman and was answering him.

The SPEAKER. No gentleman can take the time of the House in debate when another occupies the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. If the gentleman will look at the hearings, which I have before me, he will see that Secretary Wilson and Judge Springer, a distinguished ex-member of this House, went before the gentleman's committee and asked that committee to broaden his powers in effect to overcome cases like Reed's, so that when a man gets a permit, as he did in that case, he can ignore the State—ignore the State of Tennessee, ignore the State of Kentucky, or Indiana, any State—and regardless of whether the stock be or not diseased.

Thus armed with the authority of the Federal Government, here about to be given for the first time to the Secretary of Agriculture, the laws and the regulations of the State can be trampled under foot, and the Supreme Court holds that Congress can do so when it assumes "entire" control over such commerce.

I want to aid our distinguished and able Secretary of Agriculture in his laudable work, but we can do so without taking this dangerous step.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Mississippi?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to ask the gentleman if he has read the bill from line 13, on page 2, down through line 6, on page 3?

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes; I have read the whole bill through.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman will read it again he will discover that this bill, so far from contemplating the transportation of diseased cattle, has for one of its purposes the preventing of just that.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What are you going to do with the diseased cattle? Are you going to unload them on the State? Who is to say when they are diseased? The Secretary of Agriculture at "all times" and no State officer can intervene.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The diseased cattle can not be transported at all, because one of the objects of the bill is to have the Secretary of Agriculture, through his experts, examine the herd, and it is only allowed to be transported at all on condition that the herd is found absolutely free from all infectious, contagious, or communicable disease.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. Now suppose some contagion breaks out amongst the herd on its way from Texas to Kentucky, then what?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If contagion breaks out——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. It is still under the power of the Federal authority and all State laws "suspended."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has asked the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If the gentleman desires me to answer that question——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I will answer it by saying that the herd is still under the supervision and control of the experts of the Department of Agriculture; and if a herd clear of disease should stop and disease should break out in the herd in transitu, then the Secretary of Agriculture, under this act, has the power necessary to quarantine, otherwise deal with, and, if necessary, destroy the herd.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Exactly. Now, Mr. Speaker, that presumes that the Secretary of Agriculture is going to have an agent go right along after every herd of cattle that starts in Texas and walks to New York, which is ridiculous, and he will never have any such arrangement. On the contrary, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said a while ago that when he gave a health certificate in Texas it armed the owner of the herd to carry them to the State of New York, regardless of State lines and State laws and regulations, whether the stock was diseased or not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If any complaint is made in transit of disease which has broken out, then the herd will be dealt with like other diseased animals.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. With all due respect, who is going to make the complaint? Will it be made by the owner of the cattle? No; because if he makes complaint himself, then he must submit to delays for an examination which he does not want, and have the diseased cattle killed.

I succeeded in getting the gentleman from New York to make one change; that is, by striking out the words "or may remain therein." Now, the point I make is that the stock may become infected in transit and particularly in transit on foot, and even if Congress has the power, which is denied, Congress ought not to arm the Secretary of Agriculture to permit the driving of diseased cattle, or, if you please, of healthy cattle—because no one knows that they are healthy—beyond the lines of the State of Colorado or Missouri or Indiana or Kentucky, or any State, without allowing each State to inspect them. Some of the decisions of the Supreme Court hold that the States never surrendered their right to exclude harmful commerce; that they retained this right of self-defense to protect their State as such, their property, their homes, and families.

Such "commerce" is classed as noncommercial, and can be and has been excluded by the States. An example is the cigarette case from Tennessee (Austin v. State, 179 U. S., p. 343). But the supreme court of Tennessee and the Supreme Court of the United States held that the State could do this until Congress spoke out and recognized cigarettes as legitimate commerce—as "commerce"—as was the Leisy v. Hardin case, referred to in the Austin case.

But in this bill—enacted—Congress assumes entire control over the legitimate and illegitimate—the "commerce"—moral and immoral, and in doing so suspends all State laws in conflict with this act of Congress, which I say is bad policy and dangerous in the extreme.

My amendment does not destroy the purpose of this bill. It simply says when stock comes to the State line in a certain way, "you must stop and get a permit," particularly when you come on foot, regardless of whether diseased or not. You can not walk along through this State and scatter disease and interfere with the peace and happiness of the community.

The question of fees is a small matter to be weighed by the side of the health of the people and their stock, and the preservation of the police powers of the States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi and Mr. SLAYDEN rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi, a member of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I hope that the gentleman's amendment will not be adopted. It will cripple, if not defeat, the operation of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, this bill does not in the slightest degree interfere with the reserved police powers of the State; and, moreover, if it attempted to do that, it would, in so far as that attempt went, be absolutely null and void. This bill merely attempts to give to the Secretary of Agriculture a power which he has been exercising under the impression that he had it and which was not questioned until lately, when it was questioned by the State of Colorado in the case called The State of Colorado against Reed, which went to the Supreme Court. The bill does not interfere with the police power or the quarantine power—the sanitary power—of the State as to anything within the State after it is landed there, nor could it do it if we desired it to do so. All it does is to attempt to keep interstate commerce in cattle and stock free from vexatious and exorbitant interference and fees upon the part of State authorities, or boards, acting frequently for the mere purpose of collecting fees. In the particular case referred to——

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In just a moment.

In the case referred to, Reed against Colorado, as it went up to the Supreme Court there was no pretense that the herd was diseased. It was simply to assert the right and authority of Colorado to examine the cattle and to seize them for the purpose of seeing if they were diseased.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the Constitution of the United States is, in my mind, the most sacred nonreligious instrument in the world; but it is just as sacred in the powers which it confers upon the Federal Government as in the powers reserved to the States. It is just as much our sacred duty to preserve them as to preserve the nondelegated rights of the States, which are not conferred upon the Federal Government. The power to regulate interstate commerce is one of the powers conferred upon the Federal Government.

Now, let me make an historical statement, so that the House may thoroughly understand the bill. When the Department of Agriculture was formed or inaugurated the law transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture all the powers which had been theretofore vested in the Commissioner of Agriculture, but there not having been any department, but only a bureau of agriculture, there were certain powers which were conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury in aid of the operation of the bureau of agriculture, because it was thought that the powers were too extensive and too great to be conferred upon a mere commissioner. Now, when the Department of Agriculture was organized, Congress neglected to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture the powers vested for the purpose of the operation of the bureau of agriculture in the Secretary of the Treasury. The consequence was that the Secretary of the Treasury was left with the purely legal power without any force to execute it, and the Secretary of Agriculture was left with the force, but without any law behind him.

This was not noticed, and the power herein sought has been exercised by the Secretary of Agriculture for twelve years. He has been examining and giving certificates or clean bills of health to herds of cattle which were to go into interstate commerce for twelve years, until the other day this law case arose out in Colorado, which went to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court decided virtually as follows, namely: That while Congress had the power to confer this power upon the Secretary of Agriculture, it had not done it; that it had conferred it upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and never transferred it to the Secretary of Agriculture; that while the Secretary of the Treasury might have the lawful power he had not sought to exercise it; that the Agricultural Department could not exercise a power conferred if at all by Congress on the Secretary of the Treasury alone.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if every herd of cattle starting from the State of Texas to go into the Northern market is to be stopped at every State line and subjected to examination and fees and delay and everything else that is proposed, if this bill were not passed, you have left a tariff upon interstate-commerce cattle at every State line, which would probably destroy and certainly cripple the commerce of the shipper of cattle from out West.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In one moment; I will not forget it. It would be very much better for the State of Texas than for the State of Colorado to leave the law as it is—to fail to pass this bill. I have merely incidentally used the State of Texas as an illustration. Texas can take her export cattle and export them from Galveston and keep them within the State of Texas until they reach a port of export; but take the State of Colorado, for an example, and the cattle from that State must go to the seaboard for export, and be subject to serious and vexatious charges in every State.

Now, the State board, of course, has three or four active interests. One is the public good and protection of health to cattle in the State. So far, so good. That is very plausible. Another one, unfortunately, is, however, the opportunity to collect fees, as in this particular case there was no reason to believe that the Texas herd was afflicted with any communicable disease at all. There was no assertion that they might be, but the mere power which the Supreme Court decided the State board had was put into operation, and there was no practical result except, of course, the collection of the fees.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if there is on the floor of this House any one man, as much as another, a stickler for keeping up sacredly the exact line of demarcation which the Federal Constitution has written down between the powers of the State and the powers of the Federal Government, I am that man.

If I thought there was a single thing in this bill which conflicted with the reserved rights of the State in the exercise of its police power for the protection of the people as to health or morals, I certainly would not advocate it. There is nothing of the sort in this bill, and the assertion that it enables the Secretary of Agriculture to carry diseased cattle through the State is mere brutum fulmen. The assertion proceeds on the idea or assumption that the Secretary of Agriculture would be either corrupt or inefficient, or that his agents would be corrupt or inefficient. The very starting point for the operation of the bill is the ascertainment of the fact that there is no disease in the herd proposed to be carried. And in order to provide for the contingency of disease breaking out in transit the balance of section 1 from line 13, on page 2, to the end of the section is put in and fully covers the matter, in my opinion. Now, I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee for a question.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman says that this bill does not give the Secretary of Agriculture permit to take cattle from Texas to New York regardless of the State authorities.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not say that. I said it did not arm the Secretary of Agriculture with the power to introduce diseased cattle into a State.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has the State a reserved right to judge of that? Is the Government going to pay men to trot along behind the herd to see whether they are sick or not?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The Secretary of Agriculture will ascertain whether the cattle are sick with any communicable disease, as he does in all other cases. There will be plenty of people whose interest it is to give him information, and it is the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to keep supervision and control of the matter. Now, then, let me put this to the gentleman from Tennessee. Suppose, for example, a herd of cattle were in transitu from Texas to Tennessee and in some way or other came into the State of Tennessee and were there landed. After they landed they would cease to be articles of interstate commerce and would become immediately subject to the police and sanitary powers of the State of Tennessee, but as long as they were in transitu they would be articles of interstate commerce and the jurisdiction of the question of dealing with them is by the Constitution itself and not by us vested in the Federal power.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Suppose that the cattle are diseased, and you start them at Shelby County, near where you were born and reared, fortunately, and you drive them out to the other end of the State, and because they are in transitu and subject to Federal legislation under this bill, and you go on to Virginia and she says: "Mr. WILLIAMS, you will have to stop your cattle before they come into this State." Can she do it after this bill becomes law?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The moment the State authorities discovered that the cattle were diseased, with any communicable disease, or that any communicable disease had broken out among them, they could report that fact to the Secretary of Agriculture, and he would deal with the herd under the powers granted by this bill. The gentleman's question proceeds upon the assumption that the Secretary of Agriculture is either thoroughly ignorant of his business, not knowing a communicable disease when it breaks out, or thoroughly neglectful of his duty in not taking the means to prevent it.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Not at all. I think he is one of the best officers that we have ever had. But I say when you start cattle from Texas to New York every State should be conceded the right to stop the stock at the State line and say, "Before you bring this stock in here it must be under our authority," and under this law you could not do it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, if that power were conceded in connection with herds of cattle free of all disease, and if the cattle were stopped, as a matter of fact, as hereafter they will be, because all the State authorities will now learn of this decision of December 1—they have hitherto been allowing these certificates—nobody has ever questioned one until this matter came up in Colorado—now, if they begin to stop the cattle at every State line, and subject them to the necessary delay and to the imposition of charges and fees, which would follow from these examinations, then you virtually concede to the States a power to stop interstate commerce in cattle, and you have changed and outraged and violated the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I regard this as a very radical departure from the present law. The gentleman from Mississippi seems to differ from me in that regard.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; it is a departure from present law, but not from what they have thought to be the law, and what they have been working under upon the impression that it was the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But it is a most radical departure, I assume, from the present law. I understood the gentleman from Mississippi to say that under the previous law the Secretary of the Treasury had certain rights, and that on the transfer of the bureau to the Secretary of Agriculture the Secretary assumed to exercise rights that he did not possess—rights which had been, and were then, lodged in the Secretary of the Treasury. The decision of the Supreme Court in the Colorado case was then made, showing such to have been the fact. Now, does not the present bill, in addition to transferring to the Secretary of Agriculture, acting through the Bureau of Animal Industry, law which has heretofore been vested in the Secretary of the Treasury—does not this bill change the whole scope of the existing law to the extent of depriving every State of its police power, and its power to protect itself against diseased animals from other States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No; if the gentleman will bear with me a moment, let me say that if the Secretary of Agriculture had had the power which he thought he had, but which had been conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury, then he could, by a certificate of clean health, have passed the cattle on, regardless of the exaction of fees and other impositions or requirements at the State line by the State of Colorado. This is a radical departure from the existing law as the Supreme Court has construed it, but it is not a radical departure from the power which has hitherto been vested by Congress in a department; that is to say, not a radical departure from the power that was vested in the Secretary of the Treasury. If, in this particular case, for example, the Secretary of the Treasury had done just what the Secretary of Agriculture did, then the decision of the Supreme Court would have been different.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It will be conceded that the Federal authority under the Constitution may take jurisdiction of this matter. But this power has hitherto been in the hands, to some extent, of the various States. Now, you propose to give the Secretary of Agriculture a drastic and plenary power to destroy the State power in this respect. Do you not do that in this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. We give him no more power than was thought to be given him in the former bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. With the gentleman's indulgence, I wish to propound to him a couple more questions before he sits down.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The power now proposed to be conferred is no more plenary than that which was thought to have been given to the Secretary of Agriculture heretofore—so thought both by him and by the Secretary of the Treasury. It was thought that when the Department of Agriculture was organized the power theretofore conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury had necessarily been transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture. It was not discovered until later that this had not been done; and the Secretary of Agriculture has been exercising this power for twelve years.

When the pleuro-pneumonia broke out, in 1886—I believe it was in Illinois—the then Commissioner of Agriculture, Mr. Rusk, proceeded to act under the authority which was in fact then vested in the Secretary of the Treasury; and there was then done, upon the initiative of the Commissioner of Agriculture, what this law now seeks to give the Secretary of Agriculture the power to do. Under the authority of that Bureau herds affected with pleuro-pneumonia were killed, as were a great many cattle that had only been exposed to infection; and the Federal Government at that time paid for those cattle.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Is the gentleman from Mississippi, with his well-known ideas of the protection of the States and State rights, willing to surrender absolutely, as this bill does, to the Federal authority the control of this branch of interstate commerce?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, "The gentleman from Mississippi" does not make the surrender. The Constitution of the United States has made it. It is the Constitution of the United States, not "the gentleman from Mississippi," that confers upon the Federal Government the control and regulation of interstate commerce.

Now, this bill does not go a foot beyond the constitutional authority of Congress to control and regulate interstate commerce. It does not touch the question of intra-State commerce at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to read a few pages from the decision of Justice Harlan, and I want to ask the gentleman whether the operation of this bill is in consonance with this decision?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not in consonance with that decision, because the very object of this bill is to avoid the decision.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. My purpose in reading this decision will be evident when I get through the reading. Mr. Justice Harlan said:

> So that when the entire subject of the transportation of live stock from one State to another is taken under direct national supervision and a system devised by which diseased stock may be excluded from interstate commerce, all local or State regulations in respect of such matters and covering the same ground will cease to have any force, whether formally abrogated or not; and such rules and regulations as Congress may lawfully prescribe or formulate will alone control.

Therefore, by the passage of this bill, the States are cut out from their regulation of these matters.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Whenever the cattle are articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Heretofore the States have had that power.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes; hitherto they have had that power, but they did not know they had it, and we did not know it, and the Secretary of Agriculture has been exercising the power for twelve years, supposing that it had been vested in him, and no State ever questioned his exercise of it until the case of Colorado v. Reed arose.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This power has been exercised in Colorado and other States.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I know that it has been.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And it is now proposed to confer upon the Secretary of Agriculture a power that he thought had already been conferred upon him?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. He thought the power had been conferred upon him and has been exercising it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Have not the States heretofore had the power to regulate the introduction or exclusion of diseased cattle?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Of course. With the law as it now is, after this construction of it by the Supreme Court of the United States, if a man starts his herd of cattle from Colorado, let us say, to go to the port of New York that herd can be stopped at every State line, can be examined and delayed at every State line for three or four hours.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. By whom?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. And a tax of 25 cents per head may be imposed upon those cattle; and thus you virtually cripple, if you do not put an end to, interstate commerce in cattle.

Not only would that naturally take place, because the nature and tendency of everybody is to extend its jurisdiction and exercise all the power which it thinks it has, whether it is necessary to do so or not; but you would find little matters of State jealousy.

For example, there is a matter of State jealousy between the States of Texas and Colorado about their cattle, we will say, and you would find this being used as a means of punishment toward the dealers in certain articles from one State who had to pass those articles into or through another State. The very object of this bill, and the only object of it, is to follow up the line of demarcation that the Constitution has blazed between the rights of the Federal Government in matters of interstate commerce and the rights of the State government in matters of intra-State commerce, which not only is not touched by this bill, but which could not be touched by the bill, even if we attempted to do so in so many express words, because it would be beyond the power of Congress to change that constitutional relationship.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then, under this bill the Federal authority has control of the subject which the gentleman has mentioned, instead of the State authority.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Certainly; as long as it is regulating interstate commerce. The moment it ceases to be regulating interstate commerce the State becomes the controlling power.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman states now that this does not change existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman did not state that. The gentleman stated that while it changed existing law, it did not change what we thought was existing law, and did not change the powers that we thought to have conferred upon the Secretary of Agriculture, and which he had been exercising without question, but which had never been transferred from the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. The gentleman will admit that, as the law now is, there are four or five States between Texas and New York which can stop the cattle and examine them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. But with this bill passed they can not stop them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Not without the permission of the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. So that they may go through, well or diseased.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. No, they can not go through diseased.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And no State or Territory can stop them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They can not go through diseased except upon the assumption that the Department of Agriculture is either totally and absolutely inefficient, totally and absolutely corrupt, or totally and absolutely neglectful of its duty.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. May not the agent of the Secretary of Agriculture be neglectful? These accidents may happen, with due respect to Mr. Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture—one of the best, if not the best, Secretary of Agriculture we ever had.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not supposed that he will be.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. My amendment preserves the State's right of self-defense and to avoid giving Congress exclusive control of interstate commerce. It is bad policy to do this, I fear.

Mr. MONDELL. I would ask the gentleman a question. Should this bill become a law, in the opinion of the gentleman, on the State authorities discovering a herd of cattle or a band of sheep entering the State for the purpose of being driven across it, to be infected with contagious diseases, would it be possible for the State authorities to stop the herd or flock?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think so. Stop them at once and report the condition of things to the Secretary of Agriculture. He would then examine the herd and declare whether they were or were not infected. If infected, they would be quarantined and dealt with; and if not, they would go on, in spite of the State authorities.

Mr. MONDELL. If the officer acting under the Secretary of Agriculture then delivered the report that the herd was not afflicted with a contagious disease and not dangerous, the stock would go through in spite of the State laws.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly; and the gentleman must see that somebody must sit in judgment upon that question. As this is a matter of interstate commerce, the somebody who should sit in judgment upon it is a Federal authority. Now, you might state it the other way. What the gentleman has stated is possible, but not probable. Suppose, upon the contrary, that the State authorities might say that it was clear that the herd was free of infectious disease and the man in charge and representing the Agricultural Department might state that it was not. That is also possible, but not probable. Somebody must determine the question. Now, what we want to do is this: To give the power to quarantine, stamp out, and, if necessary for the purpose of stamping out, destroy diseased cattle; and we want at the same time to give the power to leave untrammeled and unobstructed the progress of undiseased cattle through the States while they are articles of interstate commerce.

Mr. MONDELL. I wish to ask the gentleman another question relative to the bill. In lines 21 and 22 it is provided that after animals have been inspected and certified they—> may be shipped, driven, or transported from such place into and through any State or Territory.

I wish to call the gentleman's attention particularly to the word "into," and to ask him whether it would not be possible under that provision for a shipper of live stock intending to keep the stock within a State to drive or ship into the State diseased animals—that is, provided the certificate did not give the true condition of the animals?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. My opinion on that subject is backed up by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the Kansas liquor-law cases and in other cases. If a man ships goods from one State into another, while they are in transitu they are articles of interstate commerce and are subject to the authority of the Federal Government. After they are once landed and the consignee comes into possession of them, their connection with interstate commerce is severed. They become the property of the consignee, and if exposed for sale by him or kept in ownership within the State after the delivery by the company or after the termination of the voyage which they have made, they become then subject to the regulations of the State. In other words, if a herd of cattle were shipped from Texas to Kansas City as their destination, when they arrived at Kansas City and were delivered to the consignee there, their connection with interstate commerce would be severed by their delivery and they would become subject to the police and other regulations dealing with matters of that sort on the statute books of the State of Kansas.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the intent of the bill is to provide for the shipment or driving of stock through a State.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes, or into a State until landed at the point of destination, when they cease to be a subject of interstate commerce.

Mr. MONDELL. My fear is that by reason of the word "into," in line 22, page 2, of the bill, stock may be shipped or driven into the center of my State, for instance, several hundred miles from the outer border, and there be found to be infected. Now, the harm would have been done. It is true that the State law would then apply, but the stock would have been driven or shipped into the State and brought into contact with healthy animals, and the disease with which the stock was afflicted would have been communicated to the healthy animals in the State. Now, I want to ask the gentleman's opinion on this suggestion: If it is the intent of the framers of the bill that this shall provide only for cattle or for animals that are to be shipped through a State, whether an amendment striking out the word "into" and substituting the word "over" would not be proper?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I think that would not do, if the gentleman will excuse me, for this reason: If you use merely the word "through," cattle might be shipped, let us say, from the State of Texas into the Indian Territory, which is the very next autonomous concern, or might be shipped into some other adjoining State. Now, these cattle would not have been shipped "through" any State nor "over" any State, and yet they would have been shipped from one State to another and would have been for that length of time articles of interstate commerce.

Now, let me follow that up and answer the question further. As the gentleman says, the harm would have been done; but if the gentleman will think a moment, even if this bill were not passed, that exact harm would have been done, even if the State authorities had control of the matter, because all they could do when they found these cattle being driven across your State or mine and infected with a communicable disease would be to stop the cattle, quarantine them, and treat them there; so that the cattle would be stopped in your State or mine, at any rate, because the State could not deal with the cattle anywhere except within State lines, and as long as they were within the State lines exactly the same danger would be apparent as would be apparent under this bill.

There are always some dangers in every matter that can not be obviated, and this danger of a disease breaking out in transitu and the cattle landing at their destination with the disease, or breaking out after they land, would exist in either case and could not be helped, either under State or Federal authority, and all that could be done would be to take them and deal with them either under one authority or the other.

One step further and I am through. If these cattle were shipped into your State and delivered to you, as consignee, the moment you had received them they would cease to be matters of interstate commerce, the power of the Federal Government to deal with them would cease, and the power of your State to deal with them would be full, plenary, and complete.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit me to refer to the present method of shipping from the South into the Northern States, it is the practice now to inspect every herd that comes into my State and adjoining States from the South; and on every shipment, after this bill becomes law, if it becomes a law, the certificate of the Secretary would carry this stock into the State and over the State, as the case might be, regardless of local inspection. Under these circumstances we would scarcely have a local inspection, because it would be useless, inoperative, and expensive.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, no; if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. MONDELL. Therefore, the shipper not intending to ship through, but taking advantage of the law for shipping into the State, for the purpose of feeding and scattering on the range under the provisions of the law as it now stands, shipping into the State, it would be impossible for the State authorities to stop the stock at the State line, even though they might be known to have an infectious disease.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is not on the statement of the Committee on Agriculture, but on the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture, himself, who states that the certificate of the Department had always been respected, and that no examination by the State authorities had been made in that respect until this question arose in Colorado. So that the gentleman will, I think, find that in his State, as in others, they have been giving heed to these certificates, and have been allowing them to be proof of the fact that the herds were not diseased, unless a special information of subsequent disease had arisen. That is the way the Secretary of Agriculture has been dealing with the matter. But the gentleman will find that practically his State has been doing with regard to the examination just what they will do under this bill, namely, inspecting and examining herds without the certificate from the Department of Agriculture and giving credence to the certificate of the Department of Agriculture in the cases of those herds that had that certificate.

Mr. MONDELL. I would not want to contradict that statement, because the gentleman should be better informed on the subject than I am.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It is the Secretary who made the statement to the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. I think we have an inspection of all herds coming into the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Three-fourths of the cattle going in have no certificates from the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MONDELL. They have certificates of inspection of the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Three-fourths have none from the Department of Agriculture, and three-fourths of them will have none under this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. What objection would there be to substitute the word "over" instead of the word "into?"

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. That is just what I have stated. This might force every herd to go through to the export market if the gentleman's contention were right.

Mr. MONDELL. I am speaking of stock that comes into the State for the purpose of feed and water.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. They might ship cattle from Texas into and "over" several States and "into" the State of New York. You would absolutely devitalize the bill, because interstate commerce is not only from Texas to New York, but from Texas to adjoining States, when the cattle have not passed through and "over" another State, but only through a part of two States. In the case of a shipment from Texas to the port of New York the cattle would be carried "over" or "through" all the intervening States, but they would be carried "into" New York after all. They must stop somewhere, and hence go "into" some State or Territory.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessse will not prevail. As shown by the gentleman from Mississippi, it would entirely destroy the effect of this bill. The purpose of this bill is to deal with cattle engaged in interstate commerce, and, in order to make that more plain, I struck out, in lines 24 and 25, the words "or may remain therein," because that raised a doubt as to the question of cattle shipped from one State into another and remaining in that State.

If the cattle are shipped from Texas to Colorado and remain there, then they will become subject to the local laws, or if they are shipped to Wyoming and remain there, they become subject to the local laws. If members of the House will read the other provisions of the bill they would see that it provides that all such animals shall at all times be under the control and supervision of the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Agricultural Department, for the purpose of such inspection, during the time of transit only.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. FLEMING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York in charge of the bill to allow me to offer an amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think the bill has been thoroughly discussed, and I must insist upon my motion, Mr. Speaker.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. GAINES of Tennessee; and the amendment was rejected.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment to the title will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. WADSWORTH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 16021, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MONDELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 16021, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For continuing the following additional force rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain: Three clerks of class 1; and 3 clerks, at $1,000 each; in all, $6,600.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to avail myself of the generous privileges accorded in general debate to discuss a subject that in 1903 will attract universal interest. We have been passing through a series of centennial years, beginning with that of 1876, when we celebrated the nation's independence.

The most important event in its consequences after independence year was that which occurred in 1803, when the territory of Louisiana was ceded to our Republic. We are about to celebrate that great epoch in a most substantial way by an unrivaled exhibition upon the banks of the Father of Waters, at the city of St. Louis.

There is no part of our land so rich in its future possibilities as that region to which I invite your attention.

For many years I have carefully studied the resources of our public domain.

In a long journey through the mountains of Arizona and New Mexico, a few years ago, I had a college-graduate cowboy for a driver. He asked me if I had seen much of the West, and I told him I knew it from Alpha to Omega.

He quietly suggested that he knew it better still; that he "knew all about it from Alfalfa to Omaha."

The subject of the purchase of 1803 covers a wide range of time, latitude, and longitude. We are interested in the Louisiana purchase because of its influences upon our history and its great possibilities in the future.

Let us go back a few cycles, and we will, in our mind's eye, see the land piled mountain high with the earth's great glacial cap and behold the dynamic forces grinding up the drift and preparing it for the soil that was yet to come.

Later on—

We hear the tread of pioneers
Of nations yet to be,
The first low wash of waves where soon
Will roll a human sea.

THE FLIGHT OF BIRDS.

God has guided the settlement of this country. When Columbus started on his venturesome voyage he firmly resolved to sail due west and under no circumstances to change his direction, but the flight of flocks of parrots to the southwest led his seamen to appeal to the admiral to follow the birds. He finally yielded, and landed in the West Indies instead of upon the coast of Georgia or North Carolina, thus reserving the United States for English occupation. In ancient times many a battle was fought upon the favorable omens of the flight of birds.

The Roman consuls carried their chicken coops with their troops, and before fighting a battle fed the birds and consulted the soothsayers as to the omens.

The Aztecs founded the City of Mexico where a vulture was seen standing on a cactus with a serpent in its talons.

But never were such great results dependent upon so slight a cause as when Columbus by changing his course caused the settlement of the West Indies, Mexico, and South America by the Spanish people instead of the territory now occupied by the original thirteen colonies of the United States. Had he not changed his course he would no doubt have landed upon the coast of Georgia instead of San Salvador.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM.

The Spanish exploration turned aside, and a different people, with different language and aspirations, laid the foundation of our present great Republic. The first settlers came in search of religious freedom—the Puritans to New England, the Quakers to Pennsylvania, the Catholics to Maryland, the Huguenots to South Carolina. These settlements in different provinces seemed a simple thing at the time, but the colonists builded better than they knew, for they laid, broad and deep, the foundation of the sovereign States of this Union. The first settlers of every land have excited the interest and admiration of their descendants. The nations of the Old World have sought their ancestors among the gods. In our own brief history we are able to trace the origin and growth of our national life from its beginning.

FRENCH EXPLORATION AND SETTLEMENT.

The mighty Mississippi flows over the remains of De Soto, and serves at once as his grave and his monument. The French pioneers of Canada heard of the great stream near its source and believed that it flowed into the Gulf of California. La Salle, Marquette, Joliet, Hennepin, and De Tonty have written their names upon the map of the future center of the world's civilization. Following the river in its majestic course to the Gulf, there the French missionary voyagers raised the cross of Jesus and the flag of France, and took possession in the name of their King and called the land Louisiana.

THE TREATY OF PURCHASE—NAPOLEON, JEFFERSON, MONROE, LIVINGSTON.

In discussing this subject we can not be otherwise than forcibly impressed with the progress of the world. Only one hundred years ago on the 30th of next April the treaty ceding this great territory was signed, and President Jefferson was soon after assailed for having not only violated the Constitution by extending his country's boundaries, but he was especially criticised for throwing away the enormous sum of $15,000,000 in the purchase of land lying so remote from civilization and of so little intrinsic value. But Providence raises statesmen from time to time who see beyond the narrow horizon of their own time, and in republics men are called to power who are willing to look further than the next election.

The most stupendous real estate transaction in the march of time was the action of Pope Alexander VI, when he took the map of the world and with a pen and ruler divided the new world between Portugal and Spain. This was a very simple and convenient adjustment of a great controversy, but it was not possible for it to remain so settled, and so in due time other nations took part in the colonization of our hemisphere. And so it happened that whilst our Atlantic coast was occupied by Great Britain, the most Christian King of France held dominion over the great prairies, forests, and mountains of the West.

In 1682 the flag of France was raised, but it was not until 1699 that the first settlement was made near the Gulf. The great possibilities of this country fascinated the French people, and John Law exploited its future with his Mississippi scheme, involving all France in bankruptcy and financial ruin, until they were very willing indeed to cede the land to Spain, in 1762. But in the treaty of San Ildefonso, October 1, 1800, Spain again transferred it back to France; but the terms of the treaty were kept so secret that it was commonly believed that Florida had been included in the transfer, though the flag of Spain still floated over the various posts.

When Bonaparte became the First Consul and dictator of France, war with Great Britain had become unavoidable. Our minister at Paris, Mr. R. R. Livingston, opened up negotiations to secure the navigation of the river and the title to the land near the mouth of the stream. He especially desired to purchase New Orleans. Mr. Jefferson, however, wanted Florida as well as the mouth of the river. Spain was still in possession and the time seemed ripe for a treaty. The phenomenal and prophetic mind of the young Napoleon alone seemed to comprehend the future possibilities of such a treaty. James Monroe was hurriedly called by Jefferson from his Virginia home and sent as a special envoy to act with Mr. Livingston, and they were authorized to buy New Orleans, the mouth of the river, and Florida for $2,000,000.

But a new man had arisen in the affairs of Europe, a man of few words, but of prompt, vigorous, and decisive action. Napoleon promptly took the whole negotiation out of the hands of the wily and corrupt Talleyrand and placed it with Marbois, his minister of finance. Marbois had been in the United States and had acquired the most priceless of all treasures, an American wife, and the affair was in friendly hands. The First Consul fairly staggered our commissioners when he proposed to sell the whole domain for $15,000,000. Here was a region unpeopled by civilized men, extending from the Lake of the Woods to the Gulf, and of uncertain boundaries east and west, but unquestionably larger than Great Britain, Germany, France, Spain, Portugal, and Italy combined.

When the uncertainties of the boundaries were referred to, Napoleon said: "If there were no uncertainties in the limits it would be necessary to invent some." He realized the value of an elastic boundary. He could put his own construction upon that. Great Britain has found it convenient in Alaska. Napoleon knew how untenable this country was for him as against England, the mistress of the sea. He needed money. He was land poor; and so, with his laconic brevity, he fixed his terms and startled the American commissioners by the magnitude of the transaction. Fortunately, there was no Atlantic cable or steamship line, and the responsibility had to be assumed without further instructions, and the future author of the Monroe doctrine was there, ready, willing, and brave enough to take the responsibility.

Monroe landed April 1, and on the 30th the contract was signed. We usually look upon great battles alone as the turning points of history. Arbela, Zama, Actium, Waterloo, Sedan, and such bloody scenes are usually the pivotal points in the affairs of men. But the habeas corpus, the Bill of Rights, the Declaration of Independence stand out with as much importance in the progress of mankind as do any of the bloody contests which have so changed the affairs of the world.

Among the greatest of these peaceful landmarks in the world's history is the treaty that was finally consummated on the 30th of April, 1803. It has been said that "Diplomacy can trot all day in a bushel measure," but it was not so with the diplomacy of Napoleon. When the treaty was finally signed, Bonaparte said in substance: "This strengthens forever the power of the United States. I have given England a rival who will some day take dominion of the sea." When the Spanish flag came down at New Orleans, that of France was raised, and floated for the brief period of twenty days, and then the Stars and Stripes were thrown to the breeze, and the American governor said to the surrounding people: "This cession secures to you and your descendants the inheritance of liberty."

In 1904, at St. Louis, we will celebrate this great event. In its effect upon human happiness it is one of the greatest that has ever occurred in the history of the world. No salutes were fired; no great enthusiasm prevailed in the United States when this treaty was made known. The nation could afford to wait one hundred years for the celebration. But although no noise was made in America, the effects of the treaty soon made themselves felt on the other side of the Atlantic. Of the purchase money, $3,750,000 was applied on claims of Americans against France and the other $11,250,000 went into the great war chest of Napoleon, who expended it in the purchase of equipment for his great army.

LOUISIANA AND AUSTERLITZ.

Harness, horses, wagons, clothing, powder, shot, shell, muskets, and cannons were bought with this money, and when the French army started from Boulogne to the frontier to meet the Austrian and Russian armies and under the December sun to fight the battle of Austerlitz, every shot that was fired was a voice from the Louisiana purchase. When that battle ended, Napoleon was at the zenith of his martial glory, and Europe was at his feet. When William Pitt heard of the defeat he died of a broken heart. But now, after one hundred years, the results of that victory have passed away. Austerlitz has left but little impression upon the world of to-day. Napoleon's light went out like an untended watch fire on the rock of St. Helena, and France was humbled into her narrow limits once more, but the peaceful results of the Louisiana treaty still endure.

In 1803 France had 27,349,003 inhabitants and was the most powerful country in the world. To-day the Louisiana territory contains 15,000,000 inhabitants, among the most prosperous, progressive, and happy that have ever lived. In fertility it is equal or superior to France itself. Longfellow, in Evangeline, describes its soil—

Smoothly the plowshare runs through the soil as a keel through the water.

From Winnipeg to Biloxi the same plants and grasses may be found, and though the variation of climate is great in so wide a range of latitude, the most valuable of all our cereals will grow in the whole region.

THE POWER OF COAL.

The same native animals grazed from Hudsons Bay to the Mexican Gulf, but with all its wealth of soil, climate, forests, mountains, lakes, and rivers there is stored within its bosom the mineral power for ages yet to come. Not long ago a young Englishman, Mr. Coates, the superintendent of the Uruguay Railway in South America, asked me the question, "Do you realize what a tremendous handicap it would be upon your progress if every locomotive that pulls a train out of New York, Baltimore, or Washington should be first coaled up from the mines of Wales or Australia? That is practically the situation in South America." In 1902, when for five months 150,000 miners laid down their tools and ceased to work, we had in a small way a sample of a coalless continent.

Imagine our country bereft of the great motive power which moves our trains, our steamers, and our factories, which makes life comfortable in the rigors of the Northern midminter. Without the coal the days of steam would have come in vain, and the age of electricity would have sought other fields. But the great Louisiana purchase is filled with the most valuable deposits of coal, stored by the providence of God within its limits long before Adam found himself alone in Eden.

UNEXAMPLED GROWTH.

Since the annexation of Louisiana its growth has been so reasonable, so expected, and so natural as to recall the explanation of the Irishman at Niagara. "See how it rolls down. Is it not grand? Is it not wonderful?" inquired the hackman. "I don't see anything remarkable about it; it has to; there is nothing to hinder it," said Pat.

What a splendid galaxy of stars was added to our flag! Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, North Dakota, South Dakota, most of Colorado, Montana, and Wyoming, and all of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory have been carved out of the land ceded in the memorable treaty. The population in 1900 was nearly 15,000,000. Although the price was deemed something startling, for $15,000,000 was a great sum in those days, to-day there are but few counties in Iowa whose assessment for taxation does not show a valuation of more than the whole cost of the Louisiana purchase, and yet possibly some of the estimates of value have been given to the assessors with becoming modesty by the owners.

St. Louis alone represents a valuation of $376,907,595.

THE LIMESTONE SOIL AND ITS RENEWAL.

Much of the Louisiana purchase is underlaid with limestone, which is a most enduring foundation of fertility. The soil of the State of Iowa, for example, nearly all is underlaid by thousands of feet of solid limestone.

The great glacier cap which ages ago covered all the land from near the Missouri line to the Pole broke up the strata and produced the joint clay, thus opening up the passageway for the water from the surface to the solid rock. When the season is excessively wet, as in 1902, the water has free access and searches the crevices in the rocks in the depths below. When it is too dry capillary attraction draws the moisture from beneath, and so by this simple provision of nature the extremes of drought and flood are minimized in their effect, and so we thank the glaciers for benefits accruing so long after they have disappeared; but no doubt if man had then appeared on the planet the glacial growler of that day would have seen only the dark side of the picture.

But there is still another and perhaps more pleasing view of this subject. Limestone is not only a source of fertility, but it dissolves in water and thus renews the richness of the soil. In the floods of the last season the surface water reached and penetrated the limestone.

Though the rain fell pure and free from lime, it at once began to dissolve and take up all of that mineral that it could hold in solution, absorbing it from the rock itself. The water next to the stone having become charged with lime to the saturation point, the precious fertilizer slowly ascended until the water near the surface was nearly or perhaps as highly charged as that below.

Thus hundreds of thousands of tons of fresh lime, the richest of manures, is lifted to the soil near the surface, and when the water evaporates there the precious fertilizer remains to perpetually renew the fruitful soil. With thousands of feet in depth of this rich deposit as a base of supplies, we can face the future full of hope.

France has had 2,000 crops in two thousand years, because her fertile soil lies over a similar source of perpetual renewal.

I am not sure that this suggestion of the elevation by the action of water of fertilizing material from beneath the underlying strata has been adequately considered by men who have made a special study of the chemistry of the soil. In the plains of Lombardy the running water deposits in the bottoms of the irrigating ditches material dissolved from the Alps. The farmers there mix the sediment with stubble and spread it over their fields, thus keeping their lands as good as new.

With such resources the future fertility of that part of the Louisiana purchase is assured.

I like to take a cheerful view of our future. I am an optimist. The statement I have just made is a full answer to the pessimists who prophesy the early decay of our fruitfulness. With these prophets of evil I have never had any sympathy.

I approve of the opinion of the old German who defined a pessimist as "a man who in a choice of two evils takes both of them."

Iowa was carved out of that empire; she was part of Louisiana, then of the district of Louisiana, next placed by Congress in the Territory of Missouri. Had that law remained unchanged the people of Iowa would all have been Missourians. Then Iowa became a part of Michigan, next of Wisconsin, and finally she was molded into her present form by the legislative hand. The memory of the early days of the whole Louisiana domain will be now revived in all the States within its borders.

THE PIONEER DAYS.

The pioneer days of Iowa are ever a source of pleasure, either in memory or in history. "In all that is good, Iowa affords the best," is the terse way that her favorite son, Sid Foster, has of putting in a few words what everybody recognizes to be true. We all look back with pleasure upon those old days.

Dr. Robert Gray says that "the past is full of pleasing recollections, the future is full of hope; we only quarrel with the present."

As Henry W. Grady said, the "old house that whistled when the wind blew and wept when it rained" stands out in our memory with greater delight than the most sumptuous of our modern homes.

Every nation looks with reverence, if not with superstition, upon its ancestors. Usually their origin is traced to the supernatural. But in our own short career we are able to follow our ancestry into a plain, practical, and God-fearing origin. The best of the races of northern Europe, either directly or through their descendants in the older States, have settled in the Louisiana purchase, and from them have sprung the composite people who now inhabit that land. But as men grow older they look with increasing interest upon all the traditions of their forefathers.

Heredity and blood increase in importance as the years roll by, and it is a pleasure to know that the stock from which this population has been formed has such an honorable history.

IOWA—A-Y-A-U-W-A-Y.

Thomas Jefferson was an enterprising man; his restless mind was always boiling with plans. No sooner had the treaty been made than the Lewis and Clarke expedition was planned and started out from St. Louis, and the long journey was begun. We first find the word "Iowa" in the record of this exploring party, and it was spelled "A-y-a-u-w-a-y." The voyage up the river, the winter at Mandan, the journey across the mountains to the mouth of the Columbia, the second winter there, and the return to St. Louis read like the tale of another journey of Jason in search of the golden fleece. When these discoverers returned and told their story of adventure at Washington the Americans began indeed to dream dreams of the future, but those visions were only feeble suggestions of what the realities have become.

THE WORLD'S PROGRESS.

We can best note the progress of the world by comparison. When Augustus ruled the world the Mediterranean was a Roman lake. One hundred and twenty million people were under the dominion of the Cæsars. But Augustus, rich and great as he was, never read a newspaper, never traveled more than 12 miles an hour, never received a telegram, never had a pane of glass in his house, never saw an ear of corn or a potato. He had peacocks upon his table, but never tickled his palate with the flesh of a turkey, never knew the use of tobacco, and never had a shirt on his back.

If we were to go into the workhouse of to-day and remove from the daily supply of its occupants everything that has been invented since the Augustan age, the inmates of such an institution would regard themselves as being the most illtreated of mankind.

In 1453, when the Turk captured Constantinople, the learning of the Greeks was dispersed all over Europe, and the world was all the better prepared to avail itself of the discoveries of 1492. The sea had for ages rolled around the known world as a complete bar to human progress; it has become a highway; now it unites, rather than divides, the continents. Natural gas was worshiped by the ancients as a manifestation of the gods; now it is harnessed for the use of man.

The priestess of Delphi intoxicated herself with its fumes and saw visions. At Kokomo man has made it an utility. At Guadeloupe, Mexico, a bubbling spring was looked upon and worshiped as a miraculous healer of the Aztecs; but in our day and generation mineral springs become practical and scientific cures. The scientist and geologist have supplanted the barbarian and sorcerer, and old-time soothsayers would have been struck dumb with the exploits of Edison. Ghosts hide themselves from the light of scientific day. McKinley held his ear to the telephone at Canton and listened to the shouting multitudes at the convention at St. Louis. The results of the Olympic Games in Greece, a few years ago, were known at St. Louis five hours before the races started, if we make no allowance for the difference in time.

Seneca foretold that Ultima Thule would no longer mark the boundaries of the world. Now, the railway runs to Jerusalem; we have found the mouth of the Niger and the source of the Nile. Before many years a child may be put on the train at Chicago in charge of the conductor to be landed at Buenos Ayres. Khartoum and Albert Nyanza will be dinner stations on the Cairo and Cape Town Railway; the world, after all, is growing smaller.

THE COST OF OUR TERRITORIAL ACQUISITIONS.

It is interesting at this day to note the cost of the various territorial purchases which up to the time of the Spanish war have been added to our national domain. Our last purchase I will not discuss at this time, for it is too early to count the cost and value of Porto Rico and the Philippines. We paid for Louisiana only $3\frac{5}{10}$ cents an acre, the best investment ever made by any nation since the dawn of history.

To Spain we gave for Florida 17.1 cents an acre; to Mexico, 4.5 for the first purchase, and then 34.3 for the Gadsden Purchase in southern Arizona, the highest priced of all our acquisitions. Georgia sold her territorial rights for 10.1 cents an acre. The most doubtful expansion of all was when William Henry Seward made the purchase of the icebergs of Alaska at 1.19 cents an acre.

Mr. Seward said that his reputation in history would mainly rest on this act of statesmanship, and for many years his expected honor remained in cold storage in that inhospitable land. But time has vindicated the wisdom of Mr. Seward, and Alaska is no longer the least prized of our possessions.

But of all additions to our Republic none have been freighted with such great possibilities for the good of the nation as the acquisition of the Territory of Louisiana.

The West is no longer there. There is the center of our land. There will soon be the center of population and power.

From the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Nile to the Tiber, from the Tiber to the Seine and the Thames, from the Seine and the Thames to the Hudson, the Potomac and the Mississippi, the star of empire has taken its way, ever to the west; and now it is shining brightly upon the States which have been formed out of the Territory of Louisiana.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Bureau of Statistics: For officer in charge of the Bureau of Statistics, $3,500; chief clerk, $2,250; statistical clerk, $2,000; 4 clerks of class 4; 3 clerks of class 3; 1 clerk, expert in foreign statistics and languages, to compile Statistical Abstract of the World, $1,600; stenographer and typewriter, $1,500; 7 clerks of class 2; 10 clerks of class 1; translator, $1,200; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 copyists; 1 messenger; 1 assistant messenger; 1 laborer; and 1 female laborer, $480; in all, $60,350.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out that entire paragraph, and I do it for this reason: This is simply a duplication of the work that ought to be done by the Census Department, that we have made perpetual at great expense. Every member in the House that has paid any attention to the business of the Government knows that one of the chief sources of unnecessary expense or waste in the Government is the duplication and tripulation and quadruplication of various sorts of work that is done, and the excuse given for the establishmeut of the Census Bureau as a permanent institution, and the reason that induced me and scores of other members of the House to vote for it, was that it would take charge of this entire business of collecting statistics. Now, I undertake to say that if the Treasury Department is to go on and have its corps of workers collect these statistics, and if the State Department is to maintain a corps of the same kind, and if the other six Departments—and you will soon have another one—then there was no sense or reason or justice in making the Census Bureau permanent.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. May I suggest to the gentleman that the Committee on Commerce is now considering the propriety of transferring these various divisions to the Census division?

Mr. CLARK. Why not do it now?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Because you might leave fragments hanging around that will have to be taken care of.

Mr. CLARK. Here we are appropriating $63,350 in that one paragraph for work that ought to be done by the Census Bureau. I do not believe there is a man on the floor of the House, in that committee or out of it, that can justify it. That is all I have to say about it.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK) there were 25 ayes and 26 noes.

Mr. CLARK. Tellers, Mr. Chairman.

Tellers were ordered. The Chair appointed as tellers Mr. CLARK and Mr. BINGHAM.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported 44 ayes and 65 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of the services of experts, and for other necessary expenditures connected with the collection of facts relative to the internal and foreign commerce of the United States, $4,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph just read. I wish to say, in line with what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has just said, that when we authorized this Bureau as a permanent bureau I then believed, as I believe now, that we had no use on the face of the earth for that Bureau, and I am more convinced of it now than ever. Here it is proposed to pay men to go right along doing the duty which has been imposed upon that Census Bureau, and which it ought to do if it is to do anything at all. The chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. CANNON] at that time opposed the bill for a permanent Census Bureau on the ground that it would simply duplicate what another department was doing at that time.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman will allow me to remark that what he says about duplication is true. There are two Bureaus of Statistics, I am informed, in the Agricultural Department, one in the State Department, one in the Treasury Department (this is the largest of all of them), and others in other departments. But, as I understand, there is proposed legislation now before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the organization of a new department of commerce, and it seems to me that there ought to be intelligent legislation on this subject, and that until such legislation is enacted it may not be wise upon an appropriation bill, on which legislation is prohibited by our rules, to undertake to treat this matter. In other words, I should not like to see this appropriation withheld from the Bureau of Statistics in the Treasury Department, which, I think, is the best of all of these bureaus of statistics. Perhaps that is not high praise. But I should not like to see the appropriation for this purpose struck out until provision is made for the consolidation of these several bureaus, so as to bring order where there is now duplication and much of disorder.

Mr. MADDOX. Well, unless something of that kind is done, it seems to me it must be apparent to every man in the House that to establish that bureau down there was a mistake; that there is no use for it on the face of the earth, if this duplication of work is to be continued.

Now, I will ask my friend from Illinois what committee has this matter under consideration?

Mr. CANNON. I think the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce has the bill, and I judge from what I see in the newspapers that they are considering it. I have no knowledge on that point, however.

Mr. MADDOX. It seems to me it would be entirely reasonable to get all these bureaus or divisions in the different departments that are now devoting themselves to these questions consolidated in one division, or else to abolish the Census Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I will say to my colleague from Georgia that such a consolidation is just what is now being undertaken. The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce now has this question and several others like it under consideration in connection with the question of the work to be imposed upon this new department, if one is created. We need to act upon this question intelligently, and we should simply be striking in the dark if we should now put a stop to this work done in the Treasury Department without providing that it shall go somewhere else. The gentleman is right in thinking that this work ought to be consolidated.

Mr. MADDOX. I agree with my colleague on that point. It would not be exactly right—in fact, I think it would not be for the best interests of the country at present—to strike out this appropriation. But unless we rise up now and then and oppose provisions of this kind we can not find out how things are going on. If this work is to be continued for all time in these various divisions of the different departments, I say that the establishment of that Census Bureau was an outrage upon the people of the United States. This is what I said when it was first proposed to establish that Bureau.

Mr. BINGHAM. I concede that the fact that this paragraph has been in these bills for many successive years is perhaps no justification for the continuance of this appropriation. A vast body of the business community has been educated to a consultation with this kind of work coming from the Bureau of Statistics; and had it been a large appropriation, I think there would have been considerable force in the gentleman's proposition. It carries, however, but $4,000. It is valuable information to the public, and, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has stated to the House, it is the general belief that there will be added in this Congress a department of commerce; and of all the bureaus in the respective departments I believe there has never been a doubt but that this excellent Bureau will form a large part of that new department. As the legislation is imminent, it seems to me that this paragraph should remain, because it carries but a limited appropriation, and through it information is given to a large number of our business interests, inasmuch as it is usual for them to consult this Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, I would also suggest to the gentleman in charge of the bill that if the department he refers to is established under the law these appropriations will be accounted for when the transfer is made and will not be lost.

Mr. MADDOX. With these statements I withdraw the motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the additional clerks and other employees in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and for salaries and expenses of increased force of deputy collectors rendered necessary by the act of June 13, 1898, providing for war expenditures, and for other purposes, and for salaries and expenses of 20 additional internal-revenue agents to be appointed and employed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and these 20 agents to be in lieu of the agents provided for and appointed under the provisions of sections 3 and 47 of the act of June 13, 1898, providing for war-revenue expenditures and other purposes, and these to be the only internal-revenue agents employed in addition to those provided for in section 3152 of the Revised Statutes. The existing provisions of law with regard to internal-revenue agents shall apply to the duties, compensation, and expenses of these 20 additional agents, $250,000.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire the necessity of these 20 additional employees.

Mr. HEMENWAY. They have been there all the time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state that it is current law.

Mr. MADDOX. But it says in the bill that they are additional employees.

Mr. BINGHAM. There are no additional appointments at all.

Mr. MADDOX. But the bill says 20 additional employees.

Mr. BINGHAM. The present number is continued for the next fiscal year.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is simply repeating the language of the old bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mint at New Orleans, La.: For assayer in charge, $3,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; 1 clerk, $1,000; in all, $5,500.
For wages of workmen and watchmen, $15,500.
For contingent expenses, $2,500.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for all items under the head of "Mint at New Orleans, La."
On page 71 strike out all of lines 10 to 17, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:
"Mint at New Orleans, La.: For superintendent, $3,500; assayer, melter and refiner, and coiner, at $2,500 each; cashier, and chief clerk, at $2,000 each; assistant assayer, assistant melter and refiner, and assistant coiner, at $1,900 each; abstract clerk, bookkeeper, weigh clerk, and assayer's computation clerk, at $1,600 each; register of deposits, warrant clerk, and assistant weigh clerk, at $1,250 each; cashier's clerk, $1,100; in all, $31,950.
"For wages of workmen and adjusters, $20,000.
"For incidental and contingent expenses, including wastage of operative officers and loss of gold contained in sweeps sold, and for machinery and repairs, $7,500."

Mr. BINGHAM. I would ask the gentleman if he has followed specifically the current law?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Accurately.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the gentleman any statement to make?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I have none unless the gentleman desires.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the gentleman any statement to make why he desires the amendment?

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. I desire the amendment, Mr. Chairman, because the mint at New Orleans has still 9,000,000 ounces of silver bullion in its vaults, and because, in my judgment and that of my colleagues, it is eminently fit and proper that it should be continued as a mint for the ensuing fiscal year of 1903–4. Of course, if at the close of the next fiscal year of 1903–4 the New Orleans mint has consumed its supply of bullion, and if there is no change in the coinage laws or no apparent source of supply for its further use, we can not expect to continue the institution as a mint.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have been directed by the Committee on Appropriations to accept in the House, as an amendment, continuing during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, the current appropriations for the operation of the mint at New Orleans, and in view of the statement of the gentleman in the presence of the House that there will be no continued pressure on the part of representatives of the district in which the mint is situated, should there be no change in the existing law as to coinage, as well as should the Secretary again recommend the discontinuance of the mint and its conversion into an assay office, the amendment of the gentleman is accepted.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. That is, should there be no change in the existing condition.

Mr. BINGHAM. In the statute governing coinage.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. And also in the supply of bullion for coinage, which may change.

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman understands that under the act of 1890 this next year will exhaust all the bullion for coinage into silver dollars. That will close it. There will be no more coinage of silver dollars under the act of 1890. Therefore, if there is no change in the existing statutes, we understand that the gentleman has no desire to press any future requests that the New Orleans mint shall be continued as a mint; but it is understood that it shall simply be retained as an assay office. Of course, what change there may be in the existing statutes a year hence we do not know.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. No; we anticipate, however, that there may be a change in the mintage laws. The supply of subsidiary coin must be enlarged.

Mr. BINGHAM. That may be.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on that proposition. As I understand this matter, the Committee on Appropriations are not willing to admit the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana unless it is understood that when the next appropriation bill is presented the gentleman will be satisfied to have the New Orleans mint continued as an assay office. The conditions are about these: The bullion has to be shipped from Philadelphia down to New Orleans, and then the coined dollars, to a great extent, have to be brought back to the markets again. To continue that mint this year will cost the Government something like $100,000. Now, I do not understand why the mint should be continued for the accommodation of the city of New Orleans, at an expense of $100,000 to the Government of the United States. It is true there are, I believe, some 9,000 ounces of silver down there.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Nine million ounces.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Nine million ounces. The gentleman from Louisiana makes that statement. I am not informed as to the correctness of it, but I have no doubt the gentleman has inquired into it. It looks to me as though when that silver is coined, that mint ought to be discontinued. The truth is, we have a clamor for additional mints, when the San Francisco mint and the Philadelphia mint can coin all the money we need. We have $500,000,000 of gold coin now stored away.

A MEMBER. Silver coin.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; $500,000,000 of gold coin stored away, more gold than we will need coined in the next generation for circulation, and we are wasting money now by coining additional gold. Why this mint should be continued, in view of this cost to the Government, I can not understand, and this New Orleans mint especially has been a subject of controversy in Congress since 1842. Henry Clay, in 1842, in discussing this matter in the Senate, said:

Among other items there are several useless mints, which only operate to waste the public money. A friend, occupied in investigating this subject, has told me that the mint in New Orleans has already cost the country half a million of dollars for getting ready to coin bullion not yet dug out of the mine.

So it appears that as far back as 1842 they were wasting money on this New Orleans mint, and we are again called upon to waste $100,000 this year to continue that mint.

The mint at San Francisco, the mint at Philadelphia, and the new mint at Denver can coin all the money that is needed in these United States, and more, too, and there are reasons why these mints should exist. There is a great mining center at Denver, where an immense amount of gold and silver is mined, and can be easily delivered. There is the San Francisco mint, where bullion from that section of the country and the bullion from Alaska and the Pacific coast can be cared for. Here is the Philadelphia mint, where the great imports of bullion can be cared for.

Now, as to the distribution of the money among the people, it is claimed that silver is used down there in that Southern country, and that it should be handy for distribution. Well, the mint has nothing to do with distributing the silver. The silver goes from the subtreasury at New Orleans, and we have $27,000,000 of it there now. If we do not ship another dollar of silver to New Orleans and that mint should be discontinued, it would be many years before the supply of silver dollars now deposited in the subtreasury at New Orleans would be exhausted. I do not believe this amendment ought to be adopted, unless it is clearly understood that when this bill comes up next year the delegation from Louisiana will be satisfied to have the New Orleans mint reduced to an assay office. In fact there is now but very little bullion received there. I think last year only about $400,000 worth of bullion was received at New Orleans. It is simply a useless expenditure of money.

It cost $259,000 to run that mint last year, and will cost the same this year, when we could coin every dollar of that money at Philapelphia or San Francisco at hardly an additional dollar of cost to the Government, and yet, simply to accommodate the officials in charge of the mint, we go ahead spending public money in conducting a mint there. I do not believe it is good policy. I believe the money ought to be saved. I believe this matter ought to be dealt with as a business proposition, and that mint reduced to an assay office.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I listened with much interest to the gentleman, and it seemed to me that we have this condition—a mint in New Orleans that in no way serves anybody in New Orleans or the interest of any section of the country save alone the officers that draw these salaries. This is a Republican Administration, and they are presumably Republican officials. The protest comes from our Democratic friends of the delegation from Louisiana. Now, if it is objected that the Republicans shall not dispense with some useless places in the mint at New Orleans that do not redound to anybody's benefit except the people that hold the particular offices, and that objection comes from the Democratic side, I would be glad to know if by and by the pendulum should swing the other way and we should have a Democratic Congress, if the time should ever come that we shall not get rid of useless offices.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am waiting to hear from my distinguished friend from Missouri, Mr. CHAMP CLARK, who is ever anxious to get rid of useless public officials, who has not yet discovered that down in New Orleans we are paying out thousands of dollars simply to give the money to these officials, simply because, as the gentleman has well said——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask unanimous consent that I may have three minutes more time.

There was no objection.

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is absolutely no reason for the continuation of this New Orleans mint except to continue in office there a lot of Republicans, who ought to go out of office because the country has no longer any use for their services, and it is costing the country thousands of dollars to keep them.

Mr. MADDOX. Are not our Republicans as good as yours?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly; just as good; but it was pointed out that here is an office that is not necessary, and when any public officer is drawing a salary that he ought not to draw, the office ought to be discontinued whether it is in New Orleans or any other section of the country.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I would be glad to.

Mr. MADDOX. Take the increases that you have made in this bill, are there not 73 made in the Treasury Department?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, certainly.

Mr. MADDOX. Can the gentleman point out a single one of the 73 that is absolutely necessary to the public service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I will tell you what I think about it.

Mr. MADDOX. Any good business man would go down there and would turn out the first half of the clerks so as to put the other half to work.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state for the gentleman's information that the gentlemen who have charge of the bill have not, according to the statement of the officers of the Department, given them sufficient force to properly discharge their duties.

Mr. BINGHAM. Have not given them what they said they needed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not given them within 600 clerks of what they said they desired. More than that, they say we have not given them enough clerks to transact the public business. If the gentleman can point out one single clerk added in this bill that ought not to be added to it for the proper transaction of public business, I invite him to do so.

Mr. MADDOX. I will say to the gentleman that I can not point it out; but it is singular that all this claim should be made at once, and after the little discussion the other day on this subject I notice that every single clerk that you have put on and every increase that you have made in the pay of these clerks has been on his application alone.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; not on his application alone, but upon the application of the heads of the Department.

Mr. MADDOX. And the records show it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Now, the gentleman has had his three days that he was so anxious about, and more, and he ought to be informed on this question; and if there is one single clerk provided for in this bill that the gentleman can point out that ought not to be provided, the Committee on Appropriations, and the House, I have no doubt, would be glad to have the gentleman point out where and why that particular clerk is not necessary.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana has made the criticism that we are expending money for nothing, and the gentleman from Illinois makes the further criticism that this expenditure is called for from the Democratic side of the House. The gentleman from Indiana could have well said, if he had gone one step further, that there was much money being expended on mints and assay offices that there is no necessity for. Now, why he should single out New Orleans I do not know. Why did he not refer to the mint at Denver, Colo.?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is no mint there.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is a mint. It is practically a mint. I will make the correction. We are building a mint there, and appropriating money for it, and spending a vast sum of money.

Mr. LITTAUER. But not in this bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, sir; not in this bill; and the House is aware of the fact, and I am only stating the fact.

Now, in the hearings the Director of the Mint said there was no necessity for that mint and never would be unless the laws on coinage should be changed; in other words, unless the mints go back to the coinage of silver. And there is no use for the mint at San Francisco, no use for the mint at Denver. You will find the fact stated by the Director in the hearings, and he says that the mint at Philadelphia can do the entire work. Then why not take the position at once and be done with it, saying that we are not acting blindly when we stop coinage at New Orleans, but that we propose to apply the same measure in San Francisco and Denver and Philadelphia. We might just as well recognize now that the Philadelphia mint is not working up to its capacity.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman has stated that the Denver mint is not working up to its capacity.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I spoke of the Philadelphia mint.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to say that Denver has no mint. The reason why New Orleans should be mentioned in this connection rather than San Francisco and Philadelphia is that bullion is deposited at San Francisco and Philadelphia, and has to be shipped from those points to New Orleans. If bullion were deposited at New Orleans, if it were in the center of great mining regions, there would be no reason why the New Orleans mint should be singled out as a mint to be dropped. The simple trouble is that this New Orleans mint is not properly located; and that is the reason it has been selected for the suspending of minting operations.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I want to repeat that the Philadelphia mint is not working to its full capacity, and will not be under any circumstances, unless the existing statutes in regard to coinage are changed.

Mr. BINGHAM. In one meaning of the words the gentleman may be correct in saying that the Philadelphia mint is not worked to its full capacity, but it is running up to the capacity that the appropriation allows.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I understand that. But, Mr. Chairman, the time is coming when we shall have to look beyond New Orleans in our efforts to reform this matter; and I wish to give notice to the House that twelve months from now, when this question with reference to New Orleans shall come to the front, when gentlemen from that section will be expected to stand here and submit to the proposition that New Orleans shall in the future be nothing but an assay office, it will then be realized that there are other mints in the country that must share in the same fate.

Take the assay office at Denver, Colo. What are we appropriating here for that office? More than $43,000, although there is no more assaying there than at the New Orleans mint. We have had assay offices scattered all over the Northwest. Half of them can be dispensed with to-day without the least damage to the service.

This is all I want to say—that when the time comes to begin this reformation, this cutting of expenses, it must go beyond New Orleans and the South.

A MEMBER. Why do they want to suspend the work at New Orleans?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Because there is no work to do. That is the reason.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, last summer I was over at San Francisco, and the year before that I was in New Orleans. I saw the mint at New Orleans crowded with work. At San Francisco the director of the mint said that they had not work enough to keep all the employees continuously at work.

Sir, ever since I have been in Congress there has been an effort to stop operations at the New Orleans mint. It seems to me, sir, that if the mint at New Orleans was ever necessary, if it was ever proper to build a mint there, it certainly is not improper to continue it now. That mint is certainly nearer the silver-producing and gold-producing portion of the United States and the gold-producing portions of Mexico and South America, from which gold can be brought in and coined, than the city of New York or Philadelphia. But, sir, the spirit of our legislation seems to be that everything in the minting business shall be centered at Philadelphia; that the gold from the Klondike and from the Philippines, if there is any gold there, and from Colorado, and from all the gold-producing points of the West, as well as whatever silver may be mined, shall be hauled clear across the continent and coined at Philadelphia, and that then the coin shall be put upon an express car and shipped back to the points where it is really needed.

Now, the reason why we put the mints out in the West was to have them where the gold and silver was mined and where it is yet. The reason why the cotton manufacturers in the South are flourishing as never before is that we are taking the machinery to the cotton fields. Why do you gentlemen wish to strike down the mints, older than your grandfathers are? Why do you not strike them down in Denver? Instead of that you are building, as the gentleman from Georgia said. There will come a day of reformation. Why do you want to cut down one in contiguous territory to the gold-producing country? Why did you put a mint in Philadelphia? Was it when the country had forty-six States? No; it was in the infancy of the country, when it was nearer the center of civilization and population. It is not that now, either in population or in civilization. Between the lines, gentlemen, I can see a purpose of Congress, and perhaps there are some Democrats in it, to have all of our coining done at Philadelphia, and have the Government pay, as it does now under some circumstances, for the transportation of the bullion from the West to Philadelphia and then transporting the coin back to the West again. I have always opposed the discontinuance of this mint and also the mint at Denver, and I shall continue to do so.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to continue the debate; neither is it my purpose to go into the relations of the coinage interests throughout the country, nor as to whether it could best be done in Philadelphia. We have the mint at Philadelphia and it was constructed early in the thirties. Around it has grown up the great States and commercial and industrial interests of the country. To-day it is regarded as the best-equipped mint in the world. By the statement of the Director of the Mint, the entire coinage of this Government could be done in the mint in Philadelphia. In 1890 the Government determined to build a new mint in the city of Philadelphia. It has taken eleven years to consummate the structure. I stated in the debate then that the sale of the old building in the center of the city, I thought, in the main, would meet the construction of the new mint. The appropriation under the new statute was $2,000,000. The sale of the mint within the present year has been made at $2,000,000. Therefore the best mint in the world to-day is in the possession of the Government without the expenditure of a single dollar.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for I think his judgment is as good as the Director of the Mint, and I know you both. Does the gentleman think it is good policy for the Government to close all its mints and have all the coinage done in Philadelphia?

Mr. BINGHAM. I am not talking about the policy. I only stated the action of the Committee on Appropriations accepting the amendment of the gentleman from Louisiana, and I read from the slip of paper I had in my hand.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Territory of Hawaii: For governor, $5,000; secretary, $3,000; chief justice, $5,500; and two associate justices, at $5,000 each; in all, $23,500.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why we pay the governor and the judges of the Territory of Hawaii more than we pay the judges and governors of other Territories?

Mr. BINGHAM. They are fixed by statute.

Mr. CLARK. How did they come to be fixed by statute for that amount?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was by the law passed by the House——

Mr. CLARK. What was the reason for it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not know the reason for it.

Mr. CLARK. Nobody else. I move to cut them down to the same amount as is paid the others.

Mr. BINGHAM. To that, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it changes existing law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri can not be in earnest when he has been told that the salaries have been fixed by statute. We do not legislate in an appropriation bill; we take the statutes as they stand and appropriate the money under the law, and that is all we can do.

Mr. CLARK. Why, Mr. Chairman, this is a statute that we are passing now. I do not see why you can not cut salaries down, and that would be repealing the other statute.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The rule simply says that you can not legislate on an appropriation bill, and that is the reason.

Mr. CLARK. I do not believe that point of order is well taken.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri insist upon his amendment?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; I want to cut down these salaries to the same amount as is paid these officials in the other Territories.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please state his amendment.

Mr. CLARK. The amendment is to cut the salary of the governor of the Territory of Hawaii to $3,000 and that of the judges of the supreme court to $4,000. It seems to me there is no sense in giving those men out there in Hawaii more than men get who hold similar positions down in Oklahoma, New Mexico, and Arizona.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the Chair has the statute there before him, I would respectfully refer him to the act of April, 1900, volume 31, page 153. I would state that we have simply followed the statute.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. I have made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. BINGHAM. I submit that it changes existing law.

Mr. CLARK. This is making a proportional appropriation. They can sue in the Court of Claims and get the rest of it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would call the attention of the Chairman also to page 1 of the bill, which is as follows:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for the object hereinafter expressed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is inclined to hold that the amendment is not subject to the point of order, but would be glad to hear from the gentleman further if he wishes to discuss the question.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is my opinion that the rulings of the Chair have always been to the contrary.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, that question came up on the appropriation for the Indian inspectors one or two sessions ago. The law fixes the salary of an Indian inspector at $3,000. The appropriation is $2,500, and that has been followed for the last eight or ten years. It was held directly by the Chair on the Indian appropriation bill that it was perfectly proper for Congress to refuse to pass any appropriations or to cut the amount down to any sum. Of course that gave to the officials, possibly, the right to go into the Court of Claims and get the balance of the money.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been held that the appropriation of a less sum than the amount fixed by law for the salary of an officer is not a change of law, even though it be accompanied by such a condition as practically effects a reduction of salary.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the reading of the bill, it goes on and provides that the amount so appropriated shall be in full compensation for the services.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is right.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. Then if we pass this amendment it would be making new law. We say so much appropriated, which shall be in full compensation for service.

Mr. MANN. In that case, Mr. Chairman, would the point of order lie to this amendment or to the provision of the bill which changes existing law?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is too late now to raise that point.

Mr. MANN. If it is too late for that, that would not affect this amendment. This amendment does not change existing law. It is the provision of the bill just referred to which changes existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. In conformity with former rulings on amendments of this character, the Chair is of opinion that the point of order is not well taken, and it is therefore overruled.

Mr. BINGHAM. Very well; we will take a vote on the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK) there were—ayes 38, noes 55.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For judges of circuit courts, at $3,000 each, so much as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania what is meant by the paragraph which has just been read, referring to the words "so much as may be necessary," etc.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would state to the gentleman that the limitation under the statute is the compensation of the judges—$3,000—but the statute allows the President, at his discretion, to indicate the number of judges necessary. We have confined this appropriation to the existing order or condition which now prevails. The limitation in the statute is on the compensation. There is no limitation in the statute upon the number of judges to be appointed, that being discretionary with the President.

Mr. MADDOX. It seemed to me to be very awkwardly worded, and I did not understand that. The words "or so much as may be necessary" seemed to appropriate indefinitely.

Mr. BINGHAM. So much money as may be necessary is included. It is an indefinite appropriation.

Mr. MADDOX. It seemed to me to be very indefinite.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingent expenses of the Territory of Hawaii, to be expended by the governor for stationery, postage, and incidentals, $500, and for private secretary to the governor, $2,000; for traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500; in all, $3,000.

Mr. CLARK. I move to strike out that clause:

For traveling expenses of the governor while absent from the capital on official business, $500.

There is no such provision for the governors of the other Territories, and I undertake to say that all of them have to travel just as much as the governor of Hawaii does.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. CLARK, on a division (demanded by Mr. CLARK) there were—ayes 34, noes 51.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the employment of such additional temporary force of clerks, messengers, laborers, and other assistants, rendered necessary because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, as in the judgment of the Secretary of War may be proper and necessary to the prompt, efficient, and accurate dispatch of official business in the War Department and its bureaus, to be allotted by the Secretary of War to such bureaus and offices as the exigencies of the needs of the service may demand, $541,430. Persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation or other appropriations for additional employees because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, or to be transferred from any position in the classified service to positions paid under this or said other appropriations.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask——

Mr. COWHERD. I hope the gentleman will reserve the point of order.

Mr. CLARK. Yes; I do reserve the point of order, and make it, too.

I want to inquire how it happens that the committee recommend that those examined under the Civil Service Commission shall not be appointed to any of these places?

Mr. BINGHAM. The civil service extends to all of these places now by act of Congress.

Mr. CLARK. Well, I know, but it says here in so many words:

Persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation or other appropriations for additional employees because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, or to be transferred from any position in the classified service to positions paid under this or said other appropriations.

I want to know the meaning of that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will explain to the gentleman about it. This was the condition when this temporary force was provided for. Of course the salaries were not fixed in the lump-sum appropriation. The different departments acquired the habit of taking men out of the classified service and appointing them under this lump-sum appropriation and increasing their salaries. In the following year, to prevent that, this provision was put on, and it has remained since.

Mr. COWHERD. It is not in the last bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. COWHERD. In the last legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; it is the verbiage of the bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes. The object of the provision was to prevent the taking of clerks out of the Departments, from the classified service, and putting them in under this provision and increasing their salaries. We provided that all clerks who had been so transferred should be retransferred back to the service from which they came, and that none of the clerks appointed under this lump-sum appropriation should be put into the classified service, the idea being to keep them out of the regular force until Congress got ready to put them there.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman will pardon me, is not this an entirely different provision of law, and have you not got here a new provision of law, that in the selection of these temporary clerks you can not go to the eligible list or to any person eligible to appointment under the civil service?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Not at all.

Mr. COWHERD. That is the language of the law:

Persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman misunderstands.

Mr. COWHERD. I am quoting from the bill itself.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman misunderstands this provision. The intention was just what I have stated, to prevent the department from taking a clerk of class 2, for instance, in the department and lifting him out of that classified service and appointing him under this temporary war fund and raising his salary. They did that in numerous instances. They took clerks that had heretofore been clerks of class 1, 2, or 3 and appointed them upon this temporary force and raised their salaries. Now, to prevent that practice——

Mr. BINGHAM. And it has prevented it.

Mr. HEMENWAY (continuing). We have served notice on the heads of the departments that these clerks must be transferred back to the places from which they were taken, and any increase of salary made has to be changed. We do this in order to protect the force. Now, then, since that time, as the gentleman knows, all these clerks have been covered into the civil service. But the heads of the departments have been urging the Committee on Appropriations to appropriate specifically for these people, as for clerks of class 1, 2, 3, 4, and so on, and thus fasten them on the service permanently. The Committee on Appropriations has refused to do it, and has given them a lump-sum appropriation, the result being that last year we had a reduction of $55,000, and we believe it will result this year in a still greater reduction. But if these clerks are covered into the classified service as clerks of class 1, 2, 3, and 4, then we would have them fastened on the department.

Mr. CLARK. Is there not a way to get rid of a clerk when you have got no further use for him?

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman will permit me, I will state that in every one of these departments they have been insisting that these clerks are absolutely necessary. Now, Congress has got to rely on somebody for information, and when the head of a great department comes down and says public business is suffering from the fact that he has not sufficient clerical help and that the clerks are working overtime—not only performing their eight hours' service, but working overtime—then the committee is certainly not warranted in reducing the number of clerks; but we keep this lump sum here for another year, so that the responsibility is placed upon the heads of the departments for keeping these officials.

Mr. CLARK. This is new legislation.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will permit an additional statement. Your committee in connection with this bill refused to increase the existing force that makes up the various bureaus of the War Department. We did not increase a single man, nor did we increase a single salary, believing that in leaving to the discretion of the Secretary this lump sum for the employment of the force necessary we would get better administration. We turned our faces resolutely against giving an increase of salary or making any increase of the permanent force.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to another fact. I do not believe the gentleman would insist on his point of order, though I do not believe it is well taken, if he knew the effect of it. Say this provision goes out; then what is the result? Then the head of a department can take a clerk of class 1, now receiving $1,200 a year, and fix his salary out of this lump sum appropriation at $1,800 a year. That would be the effect if this legislation goes out. Then it leaves him free to take one of these clerks now in the office by law and change him and put him under this lump sum.

Mr. CLARK. If he did that, he ought to be impeached.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, this was what we attempted to get rid of. This legislation prevents him from doing that; and the effect of holding that the point of order is well taken will be to increase salaries.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question, if he will permit me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Was this same language carried in the appropriation bill of last year?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. The very language.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That would be the effect; and I want to call the attention of the gentleman to it.

Mr. CLARK. If he does that I will bring in a bill here to impeach him.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It was exactly what was done until this legislation was put in this bill.

Mr. BINGHAM. It was done by this House on the recommendation of your committee of the House.

Mr. CLARK. I ask for a ruling on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri raises the point of order against the paragraph on page 80, lines 12 to 18, inclusive.

The paragraph in question is as follows:

Persons in the classified service of the Government shall not be eligible to appointment under this appropriation or other appropriations for additional employees because of increased work incident to the war with Spain, or to be transferred from any position in the classified service to positions paid under this or said other appropriations.

This provision is clearly new legislation. The point of order is therefore sustained.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Hereafter the Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall deposit with the Treasurer of the United States, to the credit of the Secretary of War, the receipts from fines and forfeiture of collateral from cases brought before the police court by the United States park watchmen, which deposits shall be held in trust by the Secretary of War and disbursed by him, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the relief of United States park watchmen who may become disabled in the line of duty, or for the relief of the widows or children of such watchmen who die in the line of duty.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, reserving the point of order, I want to hear from the gentleman in charge of the bill the reasons for this provision. This is the first time, is it not, that this has appeared in an appropriation bill? I want to ask him if this is not new legislation?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes; this paragraph is entirely new. If the gentleman wants me to explain it I will.

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly I do.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to make the point of order.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, so as not to be too late.

Mr. BINGHAM. On the force under control of Colonel Bingham, who has charge of public buildings and grounds, there are 28 watchmen appropriated for in this bill. They make arrests within the territory that they are called upon to protect and watch. These arrests are often for various transgressions of the law, for which a fine follows. That fine now goes into the general fund running for the benefit of the relief fund of the police department in the city of Washington.

The District police have nothing to do and have had no part in the arrest of the offender against the law. It is done by this force of watchmen employed and paid by the Government of the United States. That fund a year ago amounted to $1,700, which went into the police relief fund of the District, a fund for the benefit of the city policemen. Last year this fund amounted to about $3,000. It does not seem fair that the results of the efforts of this body of men doing this work under the pay of the Government, protecting Government property, should run to the general police fund of the District. The general police fund of the District under the statute is never in want of immediate funds for the demands of relief made upon it. It has a surplus, but no benefit ever runs under the existing statute to the men employed by the Government, who really make the arrests in these cases.

All that this provision does is to allow the creation of a fund wherein the benefits will run to the families of the killed and the sick watchmen from this body that constitutes the force under the Government.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that the fees and forfeitures that accrue to the police force of the District of Columbia is a fund under the law, already set apart for the relief of the police force, and now this intends to provide a relief fund for these particular watchmen who police the parks.

Mr. HEMENWAY. It takes away the money that goes to the police fund and puts it into a fund by itself.

Mr. BARTLETT. There is already a law by which the fines and forfeitures in the District of Columbia are set aside for a police relief fund, and as I understand, this provision simply diverts this money from that fund and creates a fund by itself.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is all, so that the watchmen employed by the Government may be the beneficiaries. And, further, the police relief fund is never in distress. We make this recommendation simply because it is fair and is earnestly pressed by Colonel Bingham. Of course it is subject to the gentleman's point of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I simply reserved the point of order. If anybody wishes to make it, he can do so. I think myself the whole system is wrong, but the gentleman from Pennsylvania has made the statement which makes it very equitable and just, if a wrong system is to be continued. I think the whole system of appropriating fines and forfeitures for the benefit of policemen is wrong. If it is the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, while I am opposed as a general thing to enacting legislation in appropriation bills, still I do not care to make the point of order. I understand the gentleman from Indiana desires to make it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman from Pennsylvania say that it was only a diversion of certain portions of a fund as it is already provided by law. Is it a fund known as the Metropolitan police fund of the District?

Mr. BINGHAM. It is called the relief fund of the police department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have in my hand a bill introduced yesterday by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JENKINS] which reads: "That the sum of $15,649.86 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to pay the amount withheld from the pensioners of the police department on account of the deficiency in said fund." Now, it seems to me that this is simply a proposition opening the way for a civil-service pension list, or a sort of insurance system, a proposition such as has heretofore been presented to this House and has on each occasion met its disapproval.

Mr. BINGHAM. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. BINGHAM. This is a deficiency which existed before the present law was in existence and before this relief fund was provided.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, we have had various bills presented to the House which embodied this theory of a pension fund for civil employees. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. PEARRE] introduced such a bill, granting certain privileges to the special policemen stationed at street crossings in this city. That bill was overwhelmingly defeated by the sentiment of the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman will allow me to say that there is no proposition of that kind embraced in this bill. The proposition is simply this: Under the existing law the police of the District of Columbia have this pension fund made up of these fines and forfeitures. These 27 men are watchmen having the powers of police, to make arrests and to enforce the collection of fines and forfeitures. Under existing conditions they get no benefit from this fund. The money derived from their service goes into this general fund for the District police.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. For the police officers of the District. And now it is proposed to extend this system to the park policemen.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We propose simply to take the money that they are now turning in, and, under proper rules and regulations, to allow them the benefit of it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But, nevertheless, this is to be a sort of insurance fund, is it not?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is already the condition. These men who now earn this money are earning it to pay pensions to somebody else.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. You are proposing to extend the old system by introducing a new class of officers that are to have the benefit of it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman's remedy is to have the other law repealed, not to prevent these men getting what they are entitled to. If the existing law is wrong, and I concede it is, let us repeal it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think that would be wise.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But let us not require these 27 watchmen to go on making arrests, bringing about convictions, collecting fines and forfeitures, and then have the benefit go to other members of the force no more deserving than these.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. How many more officers will this proposed law incorporate into this system of insurance by the Government? Twenty-seven, I believe, or something like that. It is practically an extension of a system of insurance by the Government that this House has repeatedly voted down, because it is in the line of a civil-service pension list.

Mr. HEMENWAY. But the gentleman is all wrong in his supposition that we are seeking to create any such pension fund. It is already in existence; it is authorized by law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But you seek to extend it to 27 more individuals. It is an enlargement of the system or the principle.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We are simply proposing to give to these men the results of the fines and forfeitures collected by them and the arrests made by them, instead of taking this money away from them and giving the benefits to other men who had nothing to do with these arrests.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But, if you pass this provision, do you not extend the principle of the proposition of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], which proposed to establish a civil-service pension system, and the bill introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] to reorganize the Signal Service Bureau, which embodied the same principle and which was voted down by the House? This is an enlargement or extension—as regards certain individuals, at least—of the civil-service pension list and an insurance system by the Government—a measure which, as I have stated, the House has repeatedly voted down.

Now, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, managing this bill, whether he does not think it would be wiser and better that this system, acknowledged by his colleague on the committee [Mr. HEMENWAY] to be vicious, should be presented to the House as new legislation and not brought in on an appropriation bill? Why not let it come up in such a way that it may be considered upon its merits and justice done all round?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I will state, in reply to the gentleman, that the purpose of the committee was simply to deal fairly with a body of men who make these arrests under their jurisdiction as officers of the law, and to provide that the fines and penalties adjudged by reason of their efforts shall contribute to their benefit, instead of going to a fund that does not in any wise benefit them. We contend that the money thus collected should go to a fund of which they will be beneficiaries. We are only proposing to give to these men some benefit from returns that now go to the benefit of those who have nothing to do with these arrests or the collection of these fines and forfeitures. There is no pension fund about it. The law is there, and the money is paid to-day under the general law to a general relief fund. Now, the police of the District have had nothing to do with these arrests. We want to give the benefit to the men who make the arrests, and if the gentleman wants to repeal the whole proposition, let him bring in legislation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let the gentleman bring in a separate bill, and for that reason I insist on the point of order.

Mr. BINGHAM. It is simply an appeal to the fairness of the gentleman. It is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The effect of the point of order being made here is this: Here is a pension fund established by law. All fines and forfeitures go to it. Here are 27 members of the watchmen's force under the Government who are each day contributing to this fund. These watchmen get $720 a year. A member of the police force gets about $1,100 a year. The gentleman from Indiana seeks to take away, by a point of order, from these watchmen, who are getting $720 a year, about from $1,700 to $3,000 each year, as it accumulates, and to turn it over to increase the pension fund of gentlemen who are getting $1,100 a year, and then talks about coming with bills for pension funds.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Well, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I decline to yield. The gentleman does not seem to grasp the situation, that here is a law already existing, under which these pensions are paid, and that, by making a point of order against this provision, it has the effect of taking from $1,700 to $3,000 a year from men who are working for $720 a year—contributed by them for the purpose of helping one another when they are sick, and taking care of them—and turning it over to swell a fund to go to men who are getting $1,100 a year. That is all there is of it.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, is there not a deficiency in this pension fund now of the police force which we will have to appropriate for?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly not; and this Congess never ought to appropriate one cent, and, so far as I am concerned, I do not believe the law ought ever to have been passed; but it is a law now.

Mr. CLARK. Then why not repeal it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. We can not repeal it on this bill. We are simply trying to correct one of the evils of the law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, will my friend tell me why he can not repeal it if he can amend it? Both are subject to the point of order.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman from Alabama would make the point of order against it, and every member of the Committee on the District of Columbia would make a point of order, if we undertook to repeal it, but every member of the Committee on the District of Columbia admits that we ought not to do these men who are working for $720 a year the injustice of compelling them to pay fines and forfeitures which they collect over into a fund for the benefit of men who are working for $1,100 a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] whether this is not an amendment to the law?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then if the gentleman can amend it, why can he not repeal it?

Mr. HEMENWAY. As I said, I have no doubt that this amendment will fail by reason of the point of order being made. I am very sure if we undertook to repeal it there would be many points of order made.

Mr. BARTLETT. Not on this side.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. I am sure the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The points of order seem to come from that side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] is recognized.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I was unable to avail myself of the courtesy of my colleague from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], although he occupied a measure of my time by interruption; but I will say now briefly that it does not lie with my colleague, a member of the great Appropriations Committee as he is, confessing as he does that this is a vicious system of legislation all through, to say that a member of this House can not assert his rights under the rules governing the consideration of appropriation bills, and ask the poor privilege of demanding that legislation shall not be made in this House on appropriation bills.

From what we have heard and from what we know of the gentleman from Indiana, and what is in promise for him, I hope he will never again take the stand to say that a member of the House shall quietly sit by and be denied the right of insisting upon that salutary rule, a rule originating from a gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Holman], that we shall not legislate upon appropriation bills in matters of legislation like this, legislation which the gentleman from Indiana says is vicious. Whether he changes it in this committee or restricts it, if it is wrong, as he confesses, so far from criticising others he should be found rushing to correct it. If it has merit, as is now claimed by gentlemen on the other side, I insist that it should be considered in the House in an orderly way, and I simply assert my rights as a member of the House to insist that it shall be done in that way and not on an appropriation bill. For that reason I insist on my point of order.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise a point of order. The gentleman from Indiana made the point of order that this is new legislation. Afterwards, in rising to make the speech which he has just finished, he offered an amendment to this bill, moving to amend by striking out the last word. The point of order I want to make is that by offering this amendment and afterwards discussing it, that amendment being to strike out the last word, he has waived the point of order which he originally made, and therefore, as discussion has taken place on a proposed amendment to the bill, the point of order can not be raised either by the gentleman or by anyone else at this time. I submit that point of order to the Chair.

Mr. BARTLETT rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia wish to be heard on this point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. I want to call the attention of the Chair and the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that in the beginning I reserved the point of order upon this proposition, and stated that having reserved the point of order I did not desire them to make it, but the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman waived his right.

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no.

Mr. BROMWELL. Did not the gentleman from Georgia withdraw his point of order by saying that the gentleman from Indiana intended to make it?

Mr. BARTLETT. No; but the gentleman from Indiana rose and reserved it.

Mr. BROMWELL. But the gentleman from Indiana was well understood to have withdrawn his reservation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTLETT. No; and it is not fair. I stated this in the hearing of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after an explanation of this matter, that I would not make the point of order myself, but the gentleman from Indiana then rose and himself reserved the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD rose.

Mr. BROMWELL. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do, after the gentleman from Georgia has concluded what he has to say.

Mr. BARTLETT. I trust that no such point as is made by the gentleman from Ohio will be insisted upon under the circumstances of this case. If I had had any idea that any gentleman on this side or on that side was going to be cut out from making the point of order, I certainly would have insisted upon it, and I do not think it is fair or just to the gentleman from Indiana, or any other gentleman, that what has happened and what I have done in the matter should preclude any member on the floor of this House from making the point of order. If the point of order which is insisted upon is sustained, we shall be very careful hereafter not to abandon our rights. I certainly did not mean to prevent any other gentleman from making the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think this discussion that we have had on the point of order to-day shows clearly that the rule is a wise one, and that legislation should not be enacted on an appropriation bill. Of course there are some exceptional cases where the House, by unanimous consent, allows legislation to go through on an appropriation bill; but in this instance the Committee on Appropriations have clearly gone outside of their jurisdiction and invaded the jurisdiction of another committee of the House purely in reference to a legislative matter that is not germane to the question under consideration. It is not wise to legislate in this manner; it is not a wise way for the House to investgate the question, and I agree with the gentleman from Indiana, who made the point of order, that it should be made and ought, of course, be sustained by the Chair.

Now, the only question that I can see in the case that can possibly arise as to whether the point of order of the gentleman from Indiana is well taken, is the question as to whether he has waived it. There is no question that the original point of order was well taken—that it is in contravention of the rule. Now, I know of no decision that holds or has ever held, in the parliamentary procedure of this House, that a member making a point of order could waive that point of order by indirection.

The right to make a point of order is not for the member or a privilege of the member alone. It is for the protection of the House. The right to have the point of order made is not for the protection of the individual, but for the protection of the membership of this House. Every gentleman on the floor of this House is as much interested in that point of order when once made as is the gentleman who makes it. Why? Because if the gentleman from Indiana had not made the point of order in this case, many other gentlemen might have arisen in their places and made it. If the gentlemen from Indiana withdrew the point of order, it was clearly the right and privilege of any other member of this House to rise in his place and renew that point of order. Therefore, if they had a right to renew it when it was waived by the gentleman from Indiana, the gentleman from Indiana could not cut the other members of this House out of that privilege by waiving it by indirection.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, while I will admit, to a certain extent, what the gentleman has said, I want to call his attention, however, to this fact: When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] got up and moved to strike out the last word, which was an amendment to this bill, then was the time for that gentleman to renew the point of order which had been first suggested by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] and afterwards made by the gentleman from Indiana. Then was the proper time for him to exercise his right. He slept on his right by permitting this amendment to be offered and this debate to go on until the gentleman from Indiana had concluded. Therefore he can not now raise the question of whether or not he might have renewed the point of order.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that this amendment to strike out the last word was clearly an attempt to get the floor, although he overlooked the fact, evidently, that the House had considered the amendment and the debate had wandered from the point of order and was on the merits of the question. He was solely attempting to attract the attention of the Chair and get the floor. That was clearly his object.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands it, the parliamentary situation is as follows: The gentleman from Georgia raised the point of order as against the paragraph in lines 21 to 25, page 87, and lines 1 to 5 on page 88. He reserved the point of order pending the discussion of the paragraph. The gentleman from Indiana gave notice that if the reservation of the point of order was withdrawn by the gentleman from Georgia he would renew it, and later the gentleman from Indiana made the point of order. During the discussion of the paragraph on which the point of order was made, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], for the purpose of further discussing the paragraph, made a formal amendment. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] makes the point of order that the offering of the formal amendment by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON] was a virtual withdrawal of the point of order.

The Chair is of the opinion that the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana was not affected by the formal amendment offered by him for the purpose of discussing the paragraph. Therefore the Chair holds that the point of order made by the gentleman from Ohio was not well taken, and overrules it.

The question is on the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana on the paragraph in question—that the language objected to is new legislation. That point of order is sustained.

The Clerk read as follows:

STATE, WAR, AND NAVY DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

Office of the superintendent: For 1 clerk of class 1; stenographer and typewriter, $900; chief engineer, $1,200; 9 assistant engineers, at $1,000 each; captain of the watch, $1,200; 2 lieutenants of the watch, at $840 each; 58 watchmen; carpenter, $1,000; electrician, $1,000; plumber, machinist, and painter, at $900 each; 4 skilled laborers, at $720 each; 29 firemen; 10 conductors of elevators, at $720 each; 18 laborers; 81 charwomen; 1 gardener, $720; and 2 telephone operators, at $600 each; in all, $125,840.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I am directed by the committee to insert the following amendment, which was overlooked in making up the bill, and makes it in accordance with existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 88, in line 25, strike out "machinist" and insert in lieu thereof "three machinists."

On page 89, in line 4, strike out "eighteen" and insert "nineteen."

In line 7 strike out "twenty-five thousand eight hundred and forty" and insert "twenty-eight thousand three hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the publication of an edition of 11,000 copies of the Official Records of the Union and Confederate Navies in the War of the Rebellion, in accordance with the plan approved by the Secretary of the Navy under the act of Congress approved July 31, 1894, and for the purpose of making such maps and illustrations as relate to the work, $31,500.

Mr. LESSLER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he has any idea as to how long it will be before that record will be completed.

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not think we have had any statement from the Secretary upon that subject. He has submitted, however, that the increase carried in the paragraph will publish an additional volume. Heretofore two volumes have been published. The Secretary says that if we give him that appropriation for the next year the Department work is in such shape that without any additional subordinate force they can add the third volume and expedite the work.

The Clerk read as follows:

Indian Office: For the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $5,000; Assistant Commissioner, who shall also perform the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; financial clerk, $2,000; chief of division, $2,000; principal bookkeeper, $1,800; 5 clerks of class 4; 15 clerks of class 3; stenogrpher, $1,600; stenographer, $1,400; 11 clerks of class 2; draftsman, $1,600; draftsman, $1,500; architect, $1,500; 26 clerks of class 1; 14 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $1,200, and 1 stenographer and 1 clerk, at $1,000 each, to superintendent of Indian schools; 17 copyists; 1 messenger; 4 assistant messengers; 3 laborers; messenger boy, $360; and 4 charwomen; in all, $140,520.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 107, lines 6 and 7, strike out "chief of division, $2,000," and insert in lieu thereof "two chiefs of division, at $2,000 each."

And on line 20 strike out "five" and insert "seven."

Mr. SHERMAN. The purpose of this amendment, Mr. Chairman, is——

Mr. BINGHAM. And in line 8 strike out "five" and insert "four."

Mr. SHERMAN. And in line 8 strike out "five" and insert in lieu thereof "four."

Heretofore the head of the educational division has been designated not as the head of a division, but as a clerk of class 4. This will designate him as a chief of division and give him the same as other heads of divisions receive.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York wish his amendment to stand as it is?

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to strike out the word "five," in line 8, and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman if it is the purpose of that amendment to add a new office?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is not the purpose of the amendment to add a new clerk. Without the last amendment it would add another office. The gentleman in the office now is a clerk of class 4, receiving $1,800. He performs the duties of a chief of division, and the purpose of the amendment is so make him a chief of a division and to pay him $2,000, instead of $1,800 as a clerk of class 4.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

For the following clerks now employed and paid from the appropriation for continuing the work of transferring the Indian depredation claims from the Office of Indian Affairs to the Court of Claims, namely, for 3 clerks of class 1, and 1 clerk, $1,000; in all, $3,400.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I merely want to offer an amendment to correct the total.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 108, in lines 7 and 8, strike out the words "three thousand four hundred" and insert the words "four thousand six hundred."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

BUREAU OF EDUCATION: For Commissioner of Education, $3,500; chief clerk, $1,800; statistician, $1,800; specialist in charge of land-grant college statistics, $1,800; translator, $1,600; collector and compiler of statistics, $2,400; specialist in foreign educational systems, $1,800; specialist in educational system, $1,800; 2 clerks of class 4; 2 clerks of class 3; 4 clerks of class 2; 7 clerks of class 1; 5 clerks, at $1,000 each; 4 copyists; 2 copyists, at $800 each; copyist, $720; skilled laborer, $840; 1 assistant messenger; 2 laborers; 3 laborers, at $480 each; laborer, $400; in all, $52,940.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask my colleague on the committee why the appropriation for a specialist in education as a preventive of pauperism and crime, heretofore carried in this bill, has been omitted?

Mr. BINGHAM. It has not been estimated for in the Book of Estimates for appropriations. The Commissioner of Education submits this:

NOTE.—I omit in this place the item, "Specialist in education as a preventive of pauperism and crime," and respectfully recommend the discontinuance of the appropriation for this specific purpose. My reasons for this recommendation are, briefly, that the so-called scientific study of criminals has not advanced far enough to be of use to education. At present it confines its attention chiefly to bodily peculiarities, studying the form and size of the skull, the ears, the interior of the mouth, height and weight, and such matters, giving its results in the form of statistical averages. These bodily items may, in some way not yet made clear, have a connection with criminal propensities as cause or effect, but thus far such connection is only a matter of conjecture. Admitting, however, that the causal connections were discovered, they would not help but rather hinder the school in its work of removing criminal habits. For as certain children come to be known and marked out in the school or in the community as possessing the bodily signs of degeneracy in such permanent form as the shape of the skull or ears, or mouth, it would operate seriously to discourage them from efforts to form good habits. The influence of the school would be undermined by thus creating a suspicion of evil in advance of overt acts, and thereby working injustice on the pupil.

I will say that we went into no examination in this matter beyond the acceptance of this recommendation of the Commissioner of Education. The detailed work we did not examine. The necessity of the continuance of this department we did not examine. We accepted this as the statement of the Commissioner and reported the bill to the House as recommended in the Book of Estimates. The gentleman has his privilege to move an amendment and a point of order would not stand against it.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the specialist who has been provided for in the bills we have passed heretofore has manifested great intelligence and great industry, and I have understood that his work has met with the approbation of a large number of learned bodies. Whether it properly belongs in the Bureau of Education I am not sure. Neither do I pretend to set myself up as an expert capable of giving an opinion on the subject of any value to my fellow-members.

But believing that the studies and experiments should be continued, and in order that the matter may have consideration, I move to amend the bill by inserting on page 113, line 20, after the word "dollars," the words "specialist in education as a preventive of pauperism and crime, $2,000;" so that there shall be in the next fiscal year the same provision that there is now and has been heretofore.

This specialist has published a number of interesting and comprehensive works, showing great research and enthusiastic zeal and marvelous capacity for labor in research and experimentation, and these publications have been translated into several languages, including the French language, showing the value in which they are held by the learned. It will probably be conceded that the extent to which education may be a preventive of pauperism and crime should be ascertained if it is reasonably possible to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 113, line 20, after the word "dollars," insert "a specialist in education as a preventive of pauperism and crime, $2,000."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SMITH of Kentucky) there were—ayes 10, noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 15372) to provide for the payment of the expenses and compensation of the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission appointed by the President of the United States at the request of certain coal operators and miners, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. ALLISON, Mr. HALE, and Mr. COCKRELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4850) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States, or are totally disabled in the same, had asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. MCCUMBER, and Mr. TALIAFERRO as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 6151. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry E. Burton.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 15140. An act providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, on the first Monday in November in each year; and

H. R. 15445. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River at Sand Bar Ferry, below the city of Augusta, Ga.

LEGISLATIVE, EXECUTIVE, AND JUDICIAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Permanent Census Office: For the following now authorized and paid, during the fiscal year 1903, from appropriations for the Twelfth Census, namely: For Director, $6,000; 4 chief statisticians, at $2,500 each; chief clerk, $2,500; disbursing clerk, $2,500; stenographer, $1,500; 4 expert chiefs of division, at $1,800 each; 6 clerks class 3; 10 clerks, class 2; 249 clerks, class 1; 204 clerks, at $1,000 each; 90 copyists, at $900 each; 1 clerk, $720; 4 skilled laborers, at $1,000 each; 1 skilled laborer, $900; 1 skilled laborer, $840; 1 skilled laborer, $780; 1 skilled laborer, $720; 10 watchmen, at $720 each; 6 messengers, at $840 each; 13 assistant messengers, at $720 each; 15 unskilled laborers, at $720 each; 35 charwomen, at $240 each; in all, $685,860.

Mr. COWHERD. I offer the amendment which I sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22 on page 114, strike out "six" and insert "five;" so as to make the salary of the Director of the Census Office $5,000 instead of $6,000.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I make a point of order against this amendment.

Mr. COWHERD. I suppose the gentleman was not here a moment ago when the Chair ruled upon an identically similar proposition, that it was not subject to a point of order.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Then I withdraw the point.

Mr. COWHERD. Mr. Chairman, of course, as we are all aware, the act which was passed, I believe last year, fixed this salary at $6,000; but I find that in this very bill the salary of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, who, as everyone knows, has a much more difficult and arduous position to fill, whose work is much harder, and who has more people under him, gets only $5,000. The Commissioner of Pensions, who fills one of the hardest places under the Government, gets $5,000. The Commissioner of Patents gets $5,000. The Assistant Secretaries of the State, War, and Navy Departments get $4,500 each. Yet we propose to give to the Director of the Census $6,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact of the business is that the Director of the Census at present has very little to do. I believe it is the intention of the Government to give him something to do shortly in the way of a census of the Philippine Islands, but I am told that at present the work in his office is very light—so light, in fact, that the Director has been discharging some hundred or two of his force. Notwithstanding that, this bill carries, as I understand from the report of the committee, an appropriation for the permanent force of the Census Bureau as it was created by the act of one year ago. I ask the acting chairman of the committee whether I am not right.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not wholly, but sufficiently for the gentleman's argument.

Mr. COWHERD. Well, I am quoting from the gentleman's report, and I think I am quoting correctly, that so far as the Census Bureau is concerned the appropriation is made on the basis of the organization of the Bureau as it was created in the bill of a year ago.

There is one other thing I want to say in regard to this question, and I think it should have some weight with members of the House. I believe that in the matter of discharges—and, understand, I do not criticise the Director of the Census for discharging clerks if he does not need them; I think he ought to discharge every clerk that he does not need, no matter how much such discharges may cut down the force—but as I remember, in the discussion of the bill for the establishment of a permanent Census Bureau many votes were obtained for that measure on the theory that the Bureau was going to be a nonpartisan organization and that the men employed there, or taken in there, were to be taken in practically from every district. That consideration was urged very strenuously, and some members thought that, as I remember, such a provision was contained in the bill until after the report was made from the conference committee.

Now, I find that the Director of the Census Bureau is cutting down his force, as I say he ought to do if it is too large, but in cutting down the force to the number of some hundred or two, I am informed that practically every employee discharged is one that has been recommended by a Democratic member of Congress, while other districts are left with two, three, or four appointees; that those selected for dismissal are practically taken almost entirely from those recommended by members on this side of the House.

Now, I do not contend for a moment that appointments to or removals from these places under the Government the Democrats ought to be recognized. So far as that is concerned, I am perfectly willing that gentlemen, in appointments to these places not under the civil-service regulations, should be as partisan as I would be if I had the making of the appointments.

But I do contend that when gentlemen get up here on the floor and put a bill through under certain representations, such as were made in this case, good faith to the other side of the House should be carried out; and I do contend that the Director of the Census can not discharge 100 men and in doing so discharge only Democrats, if the selections of persons to be discharged are made with reference to the matter of competency. I make these remarks because I do not want some gentleman to rise up here and say that I am making this proposition because of those discharges that have been made. I want to take time by the forelock and make this statement first.

But I do say that the motion I have submitted ought to prevail on its merits. No reason under the sun can be given why the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, the Commissioner of Patents, the Commissioner of Pensions should be paid $5,000 each, while the Director of the permanent Census Bureau, that will never have any great amount of work, is paid $6,000. I respectfully submit that this amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, for the taking of the census the Director of the Census Bureau was in the first enactment given a compensation of $6,000.

A MEMBER. Seven thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, sir; $6,000. The salary was afterwards increased to $7,500. When we came to the enactment organizing that Bureau into a permanent bureau, which was done by general statute, not by an appropriation bill, the statute declared that the compensation of the Director should be $6,000. That is the existing law, which your committee has followed in reporting this bill. Of course if this Committee of the Whole believes that it should be influenced by the argument of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD] it can determine that question for itself. Your committee followed existing law, without any inquiry whatever as to the merits of the proposition.

Mr. COWHERD. Certainly. I admit what the gentleman says is true, that this bill follows existing law, but is not this a fact, that when the salary of the Director of the Census was first fixed at $6,000 a year and then at $7,500 the idea was that the office was to be temporary and the work was to all fall within the period of two years, the time it was expected he would hold the office? Now, he holds for the entire ten years, and yet the salary stays at $6,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not when the Congress fixed the final $6,000, because it was then a part of the permanent Census Bureau.

Mr. COWHERD. I understand; but then the salary was fixed, as I said before, and votes, I regret to say, influenced on the idea largely that the spoils were to be divided. Now, as the spoils are not to be divided, it seems to me the gentleman ought to be put on the same footing as these other men, heads of great bureaus, who have more work and more responsibility.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hardly think that the criticism in reference to the discharge of census employees, made by the gentleman from Missouri, is justified. I don't know how many Republicans or Democrats are retained in that office. I know that for one I have no clerks left in the office. I doubt very much whether the question of politics has cut any great figure in regard to discharge. I have no doubt that so far as the Director of the Census is concerned in respect to retaining employees he has retained those that are competent, and as far as possible by Congressional districts.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I will state that I could not expect anything myself on this side, but the Director informed me that while I had a very capable man the time had come when he did not need him.

Mr. LITTLE. The same here.

Several MEMBERS. The same here.

Mr. MADDOX. The same all around here.

Mr. MANN. Of course, Mr. Chairman, it often happens that where a gentleman out of the goodness of his heart says a sweet thing to somebody it gets him into trouble. Because the gentleman said that the clerk was perfectly capable was only saying a sweet thing. He told me that I had some capable clerks, but he discharged them. Now, if the plan which has been suggested by the President and others for the creation of a department of commerce is enacted into law this office will have its labors very largely increased, because one of the purposes of such an enactment as that would be the consolidation of the different statistical departments of the Government as they now exist in connection largely with the Bureau of Census. If that be done, the salary that is fixed for the Director will not be too large.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Chairman, judging from the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD], the proposition is to punish the Director of the Census for discharging clerks, the gentleman forgetting that the Director ought to have some credit for appointing them originally. From a political standpoint I think the Director of the Census was very liberal, giving representation to all of our Democratic friends, as I believe he ought to have done, in appointing these clerks. I do not think now that he ought to be punished for discharging them, when there was no longer any use for their service. This is a great department. It requires the services of a first-class man, and for one I do not believe this salary ought to be reduced, and especially I do not believe that the Director of the Census ought to be punished for discharging clerks from that office. I hope the salary will not be reduced.

Mr. COWHERD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. COWHERD. He does not think that it requires any more ability to fill this office than that of the Commissioner of Pensions or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, does he?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Well, I do not know, and if the salaries of the other gentlemen are not high enough, the gentleman from Missouri can move to increase them.

Mr. COWHERD. Oh, we are all glad to follow the Appropriations Committee, if the gentleman wants to bring it in. You change these laws every once in a while.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We have not changed the law.

Mr. COWHERD. You have raised a good many salaries in this very bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Very few.

Mr. COWHERD. Some 15 or 20.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the gentleman asks me a question he ought to permit me to answer it. This bill carries some $22,000,000, and we have an increase in salaries of only about $15,000, and the point of order made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will increase more salaries, 4 to 1, than this committee has increased in reporting this bill.

Mr. CLARK. If the gentleman will give me any opinion of how I increased those salaries, he will see whether the gentleman from Missouri wishes to increase them or not. There ought to be some power, some way of keeping those gentlemen from juggling with the clerk business.

Mr. HEMENWAY. And the gentleman got off this bill by a point of order that "some power somewhere" that did keep them from doing it, and although I explained to the gentleman from Missouri that that section of the bill prevented the increasing of salaries and prevented taking clerks from the classified service and giving them high salaries under this lump sum, the gentleman insisted upon his point of order, notwithstanding the fact that that provision had been placed upon the bill to prevent the increase of salaries and had prevented the increase of salaries.

Mr. CLARK. I insisted on it because I supposed the officials were honest.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman insisted upon it in his anxiety to get something out of the bill; and, as I say, when one year rolls around it will be demonstrated that the gentleman increased more salaries by taking that provision off the bill on a point of order than the committee on the legislative bill increased when they reported this bill to the House.

Mr. MADDOX rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do.

Mr. MADDOX. I understood you to say just now that we forgot that we were indebted to the Superintendent of the Census down here for appointments in the first instance.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I believe I said something of that kind.

Mr. MADDOX. Have you forgotten, however, that that original bill was to be a nonpartisan bill, that these appointments were to be nonpartisan, and that we did not owe that fact to him?

Mr. HEMENWAY. It is true that when the Republican party is in power it sometimes passes these nonpartisan bills. I do not believe our Democratic friends can ever be charged with anything of that kind.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My friend is mistaken. The Democrats were in control of the Senate——

Mr. MADDOX. It is the President of the United States to whom we are indebted, and not the Superintendent.

Mr. HEMENWAY. All right, we will give the President the credit, then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The Democrats were in control of the United States Senate when the census bill was originally passed. It was a compromise bill.

Mr. BURLESON. Is it not a fact that the salary of the Director of the Census was reduced from $7,500 to $6,000 when the Census Bureau was made permanent?

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is the fact, and we believe it ought to stay at that.

Mr. COWHERD. If the gentleman will allow me, I was not criticising his committee for raising these salaries. I was simply calling attention to the fact that if this committee thought that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Commissioner of Pensions and the Commissioner of Patents did not receive enough salary, they could have raised those salaries in this bill, as they did some 15 or 20 other salaries. If they think these gentlemen are receiving salaries which are sufficient, then the members of that committee ought not to object to putting this other head of a bureau, the Director of the Census, on the same footing.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentlemen of the committee followed current law, and we believed that when the Congress of the United States fixed the salary of the Director of the Census at $6,000 they did not fix it too high; and we believed that salary ought not to be decreased because gentlemen complain that clerks appointed for them by the Director of the Census have since been discharged because their services were no longer necessary.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COWHERD. I just want to say in response to that, that I stated specifically that I think the Director of the Census is to be praised and not blamed for discharging clerks; but after gentlemen made statements upon the floor of this House over and over again in regard to the creation of this Bureau, that it was to be nonpartisan, and after the bill was gotten through on representations of that kind, I state that it is not keeping good faith for the Director of the Census to discharge all the Democrats from his office and keep all the Republicans.

Mr. JOY. May I ask the gentleman a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. COWHERD. Yes.

Mr. JOY. I wish to ask a question of the gentleman in charge of this bill, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]; and as his time has expired, I wish to ask the question through my colleague from Missouri [Mr. COWHERD].

Mr. COWHERD. That is a roundabout way.

Mr. JOY. I want to ask whether it is not true that the position of Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey requires as high a class of skill as that of Director of the Census?

Mr. HEMENWAY. "The gentleman from Indiana" is not competent to determine that question.

Mr. JOY. I should like to ask you another question: If existing law does not provide that the Superintendent of the Coast Survey shall receive $6,000 per year, and if it is not also a fact that his salary is carried in the appropriation bills from year to year at only $5,000?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not remember as to that exact salary, but we do appropriate for many salaries at less than the statutory allowance.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I rise for the purpose of stating that I shall support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, not because the Director of the Census has seen fit to discharge clerks from my district, but because I think that his salary is too high, a higher salary than that paid to the heads of the other bureaus. No reason can be given why he should receive any higher salary than the Commissioner of Pensions. I simply want to say the salary is too high. I thought so at the time it was fixed, and I think so now. I think he ought to be put on an equal footing with the heads of other bureaus. His work requires no more ability and his duties are no greater than the Commissioner of Pensions or the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I do not think any man on this side ought to complain that any of his clerks are discharged. Without claiming to be very egotistical or anything of that kind, I think I did my best on two or three occasions when that very thing was going on, to point out just what has been stated by my friend from Illinois would occur; and I want gentlemen to remember that they were put upon notice by me that it would happen, and it has happened. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. BINGHAM. One word, Mr. Chairman. When this Congress at its first session organized the Census Bureau a permanent bureau of the Government, and the organization of that bureau was discussed, the salary of the Director of the Census was fixed by the same body of men who sit in this Hall now. The proposition is a simple one. If we agreed in the last session to give him $6,000, is it too much? Is it your purpose to reduce him $1,000? I have not heard any reasons submitted to this House in justification of doing so. The only reason given for it is the fact that the Director of the Census under his discretionary power saw proper to drop a body of people and saw proper to retain a body of people. That is your question.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit a few remarks upon this proposition. If this committee had attempted by its action to reduce the salary of the Director of the Census there would be some force, possibly, in the argument which has been offered in support of the motion of the gentleman from Missouri; but it is understood by all the members of the committee that if this motion prevails it does not affect the salary of the Director of the Census, but means only the payment of $5,000 upon a $6,000 liability. That is all. I do not believe, Mr. Chairman, that salaries fixed by public statute ought to be attempted to be controlled or affected by this kind of action. The Congress fixed the salary of the Director of the Census at $6,000 a year when it made that Bureau a permanent institution. I believe that was a fair salary, but whether it is or not, this is not the time and this is not the occasion to settle that question. As the salary is fixed by a statute, it seems to me child's play to try to undertake to reduce the appropriation when the liability still exists and the amount of the salary will ultimately have to be paid. Therefore I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. COWHERD. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 42, noes 51.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For rent of office for the surveyor-general, pay of messenger, stationery and supplies, lights, ice, post-office box rent, drafting instruments, mounting maps, towels, furniture and repairs, books of reference for office use, and other incidental expenses, $1,315.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire the attention of the committee before I ask that the committee rise. On page 80 of the bill, commencing with line 3, "for continuing the employment of such temporary force of clerks," down to line 12 of the page, commencing with the word "persons," a point of order was raised to that part of the paragraph commencing in line 12, with the word "persons," down to line 18, including the word "appropriations." As I understood, the Chair ruled that the point of order was well taken; but the prior lines—line 3, inclusive to line 12, "and thirty dollars"—stand in the bill, no point of order having been made against it. Am I correctly informed?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Missouri made the point of order against the paragraph from line 12 to 18, inclusive.

Mr. CLARK. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. And the point of order was sustained.

Mr. CLARK. That is all the point of order went to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Now, about the remaining portion of the paragraph, lines prior to lines 12 to 18.

The CHAIRMAN. No point of order was raised against that portion of the paragraph.

Mr. BINGHAM. The part of the paragraph to which the point of order was raised was, beginning with the word "person" in line 12 and ending with the word "appropriation" on line 18.

The CHAIRMAN. That point of order was sustained.

Mr. BINGHAM. And the other part of the paragraph stands in the bill.

Mr. CLARK. I never cared anything about that.

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I have the attention of the gentleman from Missouri. The gentleman made the point of order on the theory that this legislation prevented the transfer from the civil service to these places. I think the gentleman understands it differently now; that this legislation is only to prevent the taking of a clerk already in the classified service out of his place and providing for him in this lump sum. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the point of order, and let the legislation remain in the bill.

Mr. CLARK. There was another member who intended to make that same point of order. I believe I would do it myself if he were here, but I want to give him a chance to make it if he desires to do so.

Mr. HEMENWAY. We will agree to go back to that paragraph.

Mr. CLARK. I will agree to go back in the morning. I want to treat him squarely about it.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. MONDELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 16021 and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I call up a privileged resolution from the Committee on Accounts (House resolution 350).

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 350.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint two additional clerks to said committee, who shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House at the rate of $6 per day during the remainder of the present session.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 5, after the word "day," insert the following: "from January 5, 1903, and thereafter." So that, if amended, the resolution will provide for compensation to said clerks from January 5, 1903, and thereafter during the remainder of the present session.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Speaker, I have an amendment to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "January 5, 1903," and inserting the words "December 16, 1902."

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire whether this has ever been done before?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. Yes; it is the customary resolution providing for two additional clerks for the Committee on Enrolled Bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has that resolution been reported by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. It has. It was reported from the committee. I want to say that there are 150 bills before this Committee on Enrolled Bills that have passed the House or been returned from the Senate, and the chairman has no help.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I ask the gentleman when this resolution went before the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. It was considered at the last meeting; I think it was Monday, or some day last week. I think the gentleman from Georgia voted for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, no; I did not. It is a new resolution to me. I did not get there at the last meeting until after some business had been transacted, if the gentleman will remember.

Mr. HENRY C. SMITH. I know the gentleman from Georgia usually "gets there." [Laughter.] This resolution was up and considered and discussed, and I was directed to make the report with an amendment that the salary should not be paid until January 5, when Congress reconvenes after the holidays. The gentleman from Maryland offers an amendment providing that the pay shall commence to-day. I have nothing to do or say about that, but I will yield time to him.

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Speaker, there are between 150 and 200 bills in my committee, and there is no one there to do the work. I can not understand the quibbling by members over this resolution, because there may be gentlemen in this room who have private bills, and when they come and ask me to get them out I can not do it because I have no help. If there is any gentleman on the floor of this House who thinks a clerkship in the Committee on Enrolled Bills is a sinecure I will invite him in and let him see. I only want two clerks to facilitate the business. Bills have come over from the Senate and have laid there ever since the last session, and members are beseeching me from time to time to get their bills out, and I can not do it for the want of help.

Mr. MADDOX. Have you no clerks?

Mr. WACHTER. Only one, and it takes sometimes two and sometimes three to read bills. We have to pass upon the crossing of t's and the dotting of i's. I assure gentlemen that a clerkship in that committee is no sinecure. I can not deliver the bills unless I have the clerks to do the work.

Mr. BALL of Texas. Let me ask the gentleman why he proposes to pay the clerks for work not done, dating from the 1st of December?

Mr. WACHTER. I do not. My amendment provides that it shall begin the 16th of December.

Mr. JOY. I want to say one word, Mr. Speaker. The chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills has only one session clerk. During the session he has no private clerk, so there is only one session clerk to do his work and the committee work as well.

Mr. WACHTER. I want to say that during the last session of Congress I impressed into the service the doorkeeper, and we worked all night for four nights and four days. If anybody thinks it is a sinecure let him accept a clerkship on that committee and he will find out how hard the committee and clerks have to work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland to the committee amendment.

The question was considered, and the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the resolution read as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HENRY C. SMITH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EASTERN CHEROKEES V. THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report the following resolution of inquiry, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States is hereby requested to advise the House of Representatives, with all convenient speed, in the case of the Eastern Cherokees v. The United States, whether or not the award rendered under the Cherokee agreement of December 19, 1891, ratified by act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, as set forth in House Executive Document No. 182, of the Fifty-third Congress, third session, and the findings of fact of the Court of Claims of April 28, 1901, is res adjudicata; to review the opinion of the Department of Justice of December 2, 1895, and advise the House of Representatives whether the reasons set forth in that opinion now constitute a valid defense to the payment of said award.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a personal explanation by way of amendment of the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman will be heard.

Mr. WANGER. When the call of the House was made, as I had a general pair with the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who had been called from the House by important business, I answered "present," and assumed that the pair would be announced. I was disappointed in that expectation. I ask that a statement may appear in the RECORD of the fact that there was that pair and that the pair was respected in my response of "present."

Mr. STEELE. A similar request was made this morning by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 6151. An act granting an increase of pension to Henry E. Burton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 619. An act providing for the recognition of the military service of the officers and enlisted men of the First Regiment Ohio Volunteer Light Artillery.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 4067. An act granting an increase of pension to Julia L. Gordon; and

S. 4572. An act to grant honorable discharge from the military service of Charles H. Hawley.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. WATSON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave of absence until December 20.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Immigration submitting an estimate of appropriation for improvements at the immigrant station at Ellis Island—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of and recommendation relating to an appropriation for publication of commercial reports—to the Committees on Foreign Affairs and Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting correspondence relating to the claim of Juan Gatan—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, relating to the improvement of the Federal building at Richmond, Va.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Register of the Treasury submitting an estimate of appropriation for employees in his office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for hospital at Vancouver Barracks—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, Mr. DOUGHERTY, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 16066) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the use of timber and stone for domestic and industrial purposes in the Indian Territory," approved June 6, 1900, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2881); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15850) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claims of the Compagnie Française des Cables Télégraphiques for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing the damage done to its cables and property by the military and naval authorities of the United States in Cuba during the Spanish-American war, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2583); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAHON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House H. R. 2629, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 359) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, accompanied by a report (No. 2866); which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15686) for the relief of the legal representatives of Samuel Schiffer, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2867); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15496) for reference of the claims of certain volunteer soldiers to the Court of Claims, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2868); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. OTJEN, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15560) for the relief of the contractor, or his legal representatives, for the construction of the light-draft monitor Etlah, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2869); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GIBSON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15849) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claim of the Eastern Extension Australasia and China Telegraph Company, Limited, for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing its Manila-Hongkong and Manila-Capiz cables, which were cut during the war with Spain, reported the same without amendment, accompained by a report (No. 2870); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15848) authorizing the Secretary of State to pay the claim of the Cuba Submarine Telegraph Company for compensation on account of expenses incurred in repairing the damage done to its cables and property by United States forces during the war with Spain, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2871); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KEHOE, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15657) for the relief of William Large, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2872); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4112) for the relief of Erdman Bodenschatz, deceased, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2873); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SPIGHT, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5746), reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 360) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of John D. Ryan, of Meridian, Miss., accompanied by a report (No. 2874); which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. MAHON, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1188), reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 16130) for the relief of the Methodist Episcopal Church (colored), corner of Fifth avenue and East Second street, at Rome, Ga., accompanied by a report (No. 2875); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. KYLE, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred House bill H. R. 8607, reported in lieu thereof a resolution (H. Res. 361) referring to the Court of Claims the papers in the case of the estate of Daniel H. Avery, accompanied by a report (No. 2876); which said resolution and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. BULL, from the Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the resolution of the House (H. Res. 348) for the payment of six months' salary and funeral expense of Laurean J. Abbott, deceased, late an employee of the House, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2877); which said report was ordered printed.

Mr. LITTLE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 3296) to pay certain (Indian) Choctaw warrants held by James M. SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, December 17, 1902.

Rev. F. L. DAY, Ph. D., of Columbian University, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, our Heavenly Father, Thou art eternal, and the only wise God. All the hosts of Heaven and all the varied inhabitants of the earth are the creatures of Thy hand. We owe allegiance to Thee, Thou great Lawgiver of the earth.

We pray thy blessing upon us this day, especially upon those who sorrow because of the hand of death. May we all remember that we are but passing shadows of the day and must soon fade from earth. Keep us ever under the watchful eye of the Almighty, we ask in His name. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. FOSTER of Washington, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Journal will stand approved.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that after the reading of the Journal to-day I would ask the Senate to take up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I make the request now, because directly after the routine morning business the resolutions in charge of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] will be in order and there will be no opportunity then. It is desirable that the bill should be passed now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 16057) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with an amendment.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read, amendments to be considered while the reading proceeds.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that amendments shall receive consideration as the bill is read. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to add at the end of the bill the following:

SENATE.

For miscellaneous items, exclusive of labor, fiscal year 1902, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I offer an amendment which would have been put on in the House, but it did not come in in time, and it has been sent here with the request that we put it on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 5, insert:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

Buildings and grounds in and around Washington: For extra steps and mosaic work at the base of the Sherman statue pedestal, and for each and every purpose connected therewith, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT TO SATURDAY.

Mr. HALE. After the arrangement which was made yesterday, that the contested measure involving statehood should go over until after the holidays, many Senators left town. It is evident that there will be no quorum of the Senate here either to-morrow or the next day, and to-day is to be taken up by eulogies. Under these conditions it will be a matter of convenience, I think, to almost every Senator that a few of us shall not be called here each morning.

Therefore I move, not to interfere with to-day's session, that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday, on which day we must adjourn until after the holidays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Saturday at 12 o'clock.

Mr. SPOONER. With the understanding that no business shall be transacted on Saturday?

Mr. HALE. There has been no understanding about that. It always regulates itself. There will be enough Senators here to transact business.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator from Maine that there are one or two little conference reports which ought to be disposed of either on Saturday, or certainly before we adjourn for the holidays. I allude particularly to the conference report on the bill making an appropriation for the payment of the Anthracite Coal Arbitration Commission.

Mr. HALE. I suppose we can do that on Saturday. I have no feeling about this matter. I make the suggestion only because Senators are away and can not be here, and if a few of us come either to-morrow or the next day there will be no business done, evidently.

Mr. HOAR. I should like, before that arrangement is made, to ask unanimous consent. I may introduce a bill for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary and hand the bill to the clerks some time before the expiration of the week, and I ask that it may then be printed. It is a bill that I am sure no Senator will care to make any question about. It is merely the introduction of a bill which I have not been able to get ready and which I am very anxious to get ready and to have printed before the adjournment for the holidays. I ask unanimous consent that that may be done.

Mr. HALE. To introduce it as of this date?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Can the Senator from Massachusetts give the Secretary the title of the bill?

Mr. HOAR. It is a bill in relation to trusts. I do not know about the exact title of the bill. I ask leave to treat it as if introduced and read the first and second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection, the order which the Senator from Massachusetts desires will be made. The Chair hears none.

The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Saturday at 12 o'clock. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF THE COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report from the Superintendent of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, showing the progress in that work during the year ended June 30, 1902. The communication is accompanied by a large number of papers and maps, and the Chair suggests that the communication be printed and that it, with the papers and maps, be referred, without printing, to the Committee on Printing. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It will be so ordered.

REPORT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the Sixteenth Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SHIP BRISEIS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting conclusions of fact and of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims set out in the findings by the court relating to the vessel ship Briseis, James Breath, master; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed with an amendment the bill (S. 4617) to authorize the resurvey of certain lands in the State of Wyoming in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 15605) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion, in the State of Louisiana;

A bill (H. R. 15606) to authorize and empower the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam at Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a protest of the Central Labor Union, of Gloucester, Mass., and also one from the Gloucester Master Mariners' Association, of Massachusetts, relative to the treaty with Newfoundland. The memorials are very brief, and I ask that they may be printed in the RECORD, and also as a document, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

There being no objection, the memorials were referred to the Committeee on Foreign Relations, ordered to be printed as a document, and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

At a meeting of the Central Labor Union of Gloucester, Mass., held December 14, 1902, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Resolved, That the ratification of the treaty with Newfoundland now under consideration in the Senate of the United States, and providing, among other things, for the admission to this country free of duty of the product of the Newfoundland fisheries, would be a death blow to the industries of our city and a calamity to every laboring man living therein.

"Resolved, That this union protest against the ratification of said treaty and ask the Senators from this State to do everything in their power to prevent said ratification.

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to Senator LODGE, with the request that he submit them to the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations."

SIDNEY G. PARSONS, President.
GERARD M. KINCADE,
Secretary of the C. L. U. of Gloucester.

GLOUCESTER MASTER MARINERS' ASSOCIATION,
Gloucester, Mass.

At a special meeting held in the rooms of the Gloucester Master Mariners' Association, December 13, 1902, to consider the Bond-Hay treaty, it was unanimously voted:

That we most earnestly protest against the ratification by the United States of the proposed treaty. There can be but one result should the treaty be ratified. It means practically the total annihilation of the New England fisheries, as well as the fisheries of the United States. It would seem, before a treaty was made, it would have been only fair to have consulted with the people directly connected and vitally interested in this matter.

It has always been the policy of this Government, in common with many others, to foster the fisheries, but this treaty, if carried into effect, will destroy them. We fail to see what section of this country is to be benefited to any considerable extent by the proposed treaty, and even if it was so, it certainly is not an act of justice to sacrifice one interest to benefit another.

Voted: That Capts. Charles H. Harty and Henry Gardner appear before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations at the hearing given by them on Wednesday, December 17, and that a copy of these resolutions be presented to them.

CHARLES H. HARTY, President.
T. H. G. DOUGLASS, Secretary.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of Bricklayers and Masons' International Union No. 16, American Federation of Labor, of Alexandria, Ind., praying for the passage of the so-called eight-hour bill; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the directory of the National Federation of Civic Rights, of New Albany, Ind., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the bill providing for the creation of a commission to inquire into the condition of the colored people of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Richmond Art Association, of Richmond, Ind., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the tariff law relative to the duty on objects of art; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of the Presbytery of Columbus, Ohio; of the Madison Presbytery, of Cottage Grove, Wis., and of the Presbytery of Washington, D. C., praying for the establishment of a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DEPEW presented the petition of E. Dauphinot, J. W. Russell, and sundry other citizens of New York, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the internal-revenue laws relating to a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Everett, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation providing an educational test for immigrants to this country; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Presbytery of Olympia, Wash., praying for the establishment of a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DRYDEN presented the memorial of J. J. Stanton, of Sussex, N. J., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to increase the postage on monthly publications; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLARK of Montana presented a petition of 34 citizens of Jefferson County, Mont., praying for the enactment of legislation to amend the internal-revenue law relative to a reduction of the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. FRYE presented the memorial of S. W. Wheeler, of Marlboro, Mass., remonstrating against the slaughter of cattle suffering with foot-and-mouth disease; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a petition of the Interstate National Guard Association of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the efficiency of the militia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER of Washington, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5205) granting an increase of pension to Hiram S. Leffingwell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10010) granting a pension to Mina Weirauch, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GAMBLE, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11572) for the relief of certain settlers upon Wisconsin Central Railroad and The Dalles military road land grants, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MCLAURIN of Mississippi, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 5561) for the relief of S. R. Green, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13174) granting an increase of pension to Ransford T. Chase, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6514) granting an increase of pension to Stephen J. Houston, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. CARMACK), from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 622) granting a pension to Dicey Woodall, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. CARMACK), from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 624) granting a pension to Dorcas McArdle;

A bill (H. R. 13891) granting a pension to Hiram A. Sheldon; and

A bill (H. R. 7239) granting an increase of pension to William Christian.

Mr. PETTUS, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 14839) providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Montgomery, in the State of Alabama, on the first Monday in September of each year, reported it without amendment.

THOMAS STARRAT.

Mr. TALIAFERRO. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6492) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Starrat, to report it with amendments, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendments of the Committee on Pensions were, in line 4, after the word "roll," to insert a comma and the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws;" and in line 5, after the word "company," to insert "and Lieut. Cornelius Taylor's company;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Starrat, late of Capt. William Ross's company and Lieut. Cornelius Taylor's company, Florida Volunteers, Seminole Indian war, and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15593) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1904, and for other purposes, to report it without amendment. I give notice, Mr. President, that I shall endeavor to-morrow morning to call up the bill for consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator means Saturday morning? There will be no session to-morrow.

Mr. GALLINGER. Unless there be objection, I should like to have the bill now considered. I shall not return to Washington immediately after the new year. The bill is in the usual form, carrying the usual appropriation. It passed the other House, I will say, without a word of discussion, and I think it will take but a moment to pass it.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MUSKEGON, MICH.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6399) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, to report it without amendment, and I ask for the present consideration of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to repeal so much of section 3 of the act entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1902, as restricts the selection of a site for a post-office and custom-house at Muskegon, Mich., to certain lots in a certain block in that city.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HOAR introduced a bill (S. 6659) for the regulation of trusts or corporations engaged in international or interstate commerce; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MARTIN introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 6660) for the relief of Old Thorntons Gap Baptist Church, in Rappahannock County, Va.;

A bill (S. 6661) for the relief of the trustees of Braddock Street Methodist Episcopal Church, of Winchester, Va.;

A bill (S. 6662) for the relief of the trustees of the Evangelical Lutheran Church, of Strasburg, Va.;

A bill (S. 6663) for the relief of the Presbyterian Church of Woodstock, Shenandoah County, Va.; and

A bill (S. 6664) for the relief of the trustees of the Centenary Reformed Church, of Winchester, Va.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $20,200 for the survey of lands and clerical work, etc., incident thereto, within the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, S. Dak., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the United States consul at Beirut, Syria, to $3,000, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to increase the salary of the United States consul-general at Munich, Germany, to $3,000, intended to be proposed by him to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

SALARIES OF POSTMASTERS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. MASON submitted the following resolution; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed:

Resolved by the Senate, That the Postmaster-General be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the amount of salary required to be paid to each of the postmasters in the State of Illinois named on the memorandum schedule hereto attached, or to their heirs, for service as postmaster in each biennial term specified on such memorandum schedule, in order to make effective sections 473, 474, and 475 of the Postal Regulations of 1866 and the act of June 12, 1866, section 8, and the act of March 3, 1883, as construed by Postmaster-General Gresham in an order dated June 9, 1883, addressed to Hon. Frank Hatton, First Assistant Postmaster-General, and in a declaration as to the intent, meaning, and requirement of said statutes furnished for publication to the press through Chief Clerk Walker on February 16, 1884, and printed as Exhibit A; Senate Executive Document No. 146, Forty-ninth Congress, first session.

HEARINGS ON BILL TO REGULATE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PENROSE. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Immigration 5,000 copies of Senate Report No. 2119, first session Fifty-seventh Congress, accompanied by additional statements made before the Committee on Immigration on the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the printing cost more than $500?

Mr. PENROSE. I am informed that the cost will not exceed $500, and there is very great demand for the hearings on this exceedingly important bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Saturday when the Senate meets I shall ask it to take up the bill (S. 451) to provide for acquiring the rights necessary for the construction of a canal connecting the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, for the purpose of making some remarks upon that measure.

RESURVEY OF LANDS IN WYOMING.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4617) to authorize a resurvey of certain lands in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes.

The amendment was, on page 1, line 6, after the word "ranges," to insert "ninety-three, ninety-four, ninety-five, ninety-six."

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 15605) to authorize and empower the Southwest Louisiana Rice Growers' Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Bayou Vermilion, in the State of Louisiana; and

A bill (H. R. 15606) to authorize and empower the Rice Irrigation and Improvement Association, of the State of Louisiana, to construct a lock or locks and a dam in Mermentau River, in the State of Louisiana.

The bill (H. R. 15922) making an appropriation for the suppression and to prevent the spread of contagious and infectious diseases of live stock, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

ROBERT A. CHAPMAN.

Mr. PETTUS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 6231) authorizing Robert A. Chapman, of Alabama, his associates and assigns, to use the waters of the Coosa River in Alabama for the purpose of generating electricity.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with amendments.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 3, after the word "dam," to insert "and appurtenant works;" so as to make the additional proviso read:

And provided further, That the said Robert A. Chapman and his associates shall, at their own expense, make such changes and modifications of said dam and appurtenant works as the Secretary of War may from time to time direct in the interest of the navigation of said river.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 1, on page 2, line 9, after the word "Commissioner," to insert the following proviso:

And provided further, That this act shall not be construed as authorizing any invasion or impairment of the legal rights of any person or corporation, and any litigation that may arise from the construction and maintenance of said dam or its appurtenant works may be tried in the proper courts of the State of Alabama and the courts of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 2, page 2, line 16, after the word "That," to strike out the words "the United States reserves," and in line 17 to strike out the words "change, modify," and insert "alter, amend," and in the same line, after the word "act," to insert "is hereby expressly reserved;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the dam herein authorized shall be commenced within two years from the date hereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES M. CHISHAM.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to have unanimous consent to put the bill (H. R. 4471) for the relief of James M. Chisham on its passage.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to reimburse the sum of $708.99 to James M. Chisham for loss sustained by him as postmaster at Atchison, Kans., on account of the failure of the Atchison National Bank, of Atchison, Kans., where he had the funds of the Government on deposit as postmaster.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. I move that the bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes, be now proceeded with.

Mr. BACON. I ask the Senator to yield to me just a moment. There are two short pension bills that I desire to call up. It will not take a moment.

Mr. PROCTOR. Let the militia bill be laid before the Senate, and then I will yield to the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do.

CORNELIA A. DENNIS.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11893) granting an increase of pension to Cornelia A. Dennis.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Cornelia A. Dennis, widow of Green K. Dennis, late of Company F, First Regiment Texas Mounted Volunteers, war with Mexico, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $16 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MARY A. E. SCOTT.

Mr. BACON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13449) granting an increase of pension to Mary A. E. Scott.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Mary A. E. Scott, widow of James H. Scott, late of Captain Sledge's company, Georgia Volunteers, Creek Indian war, and to pay her a pension at the rate of $12 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PORT OF WILMINGTON, N. C.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] has the floor on the militia bill, and at the conclusion of his remarks I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand that the Senator from Vermont has yielded to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont stated that the Senator from Georgia has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. BACON. I yield, with the consent of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the immediate consideration of the bill (H. R. 14801) to make Wilmington, N. C., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin rise to this bill?

Mr. SPOONER. I rose to ask what committee reported the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate Committee on Commerce.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TREATY WITH NEWFOUNDLAND.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask that an order be made for the printing, as a public document for the use of the Senate, of the treaty with Newfoundland. It has already been made public.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois asks that the treaty known as the Newfoundland treaty be printed as a document for the use of the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 15345) to promote the efficiency of the militia, and for other purposes.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, at the time the Senate left the consideration of this subject on yesterday I was engaged in the discussion of the bill, and was upon the immediate point whether this volunteer reserve was one which could only be used in case of some legislation hereafter made authorizing the President to use it. I had called the attention of the Senate to the proposition that if this force was put at the service of the President, any use of it, whether that use was authorized by statute heretofore made or one passed hereafter, would be a lawful use to which the President could apply this force.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PROCTOR. The Senator will see from the early part of the section itself that no use can be made of the force until its service is called for and it is organized under the authority of Congress.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please call attention to the particular words with reference to that?

Mr. PROCTOR. Beginning in line 12, on page 15, at the beginning of section 24——

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please read the language to which he refers, so that I may discuss it?

Mr. PROCTOR. It is as follows:

That for the purpose of providing a reserve force of trained men which shall be ready for immediate service whenever called for and organized under authority of Congress——

Mr. MALLORY. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. PROCTOR. Certainly.

Mr. MALLORY. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont if he construes that language to mean that they shall be called for by authority of Congress; in other words, that the President alone can not call for them?

Mr. PROCTOR. The call has always been authorized by Congress.

Mr. MALLORY. Beginning in the nineteenth line of the section, this language occurs:

Such reserve force shall be designated as the National Volunteer Reserve, and when called forth by the President shall serve wherever ordered, within or without the territory of the United States.

Does not that imply that it is the intention of Congress to authorize the President, without the intervention of Congress, to call forth these troops at any time he sees proper?

Mr. PROCTOR. Those provisions must plainly be interpreted together. The President can make the call when so authorized by Congress.

Mr. MALLORY. I doubt very much, Mr. President, whether that construction would be put upon it.

Mr. BACON. In the same section the language plainly indicates that no specific act of Congress will be necessary in order to authorize the use of this force.

Mr. SPOONER. I desire to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator understand that under section 24 as amended there is any authority under this bill for the organization of this national volunteer reserve force?

Mr. BACON. The language of the section remaining after the elimination under the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] is indefinite and not specific, from the fact that the language which applied to part of it is now omitted by reason of that elimination; but the Senator will perceive that the language of this section if enacted into a statute will be this:

SEC. 24. That for the purpose of providing a reserve force of trained men which shall be ready for immediate service whenever called for and organized under authority of Congress, the Secretary of War is authorized to apportion among the several States and Territories and to enroll not exceeding 100,000 men, who shall have served in the Regular or Volunteer armies of the United States or in the organized militia. Such reserve force shall be designated as the national volunteer reserve, and when called forth by the President shall serve wherever ordered, within or without the territory of the United States. Such enrollment shall in each case continue for a period of five years, but in the event they shall be called into the service of the United States, other than for the purpose of drill, inspection, and instruction, they shall be entitled to be discharged at the close of the war or after nine months' service.

Now, omitting the next paragraph, which relates to the volunteer force other than that which is immediately under consideration, the same section has this language:

Whenever a volunteer force shall be called for by authority of Congress exceeding in number the companies, troops, batteries, battalions, and regiments of the organized militia which shall enlist in bodies pursuant to the provisions of section 6 of the act entitled "An act to provide for temporarily increasing the military establishment of the United States in time of war, and for other purposes," approved April 22, 1898, the persons so enrolled as a reserve force of trained men, or so many thereof as shall be required, shall be organized in the manner provided for the organization of the volunteer force by section 12 of the act entitled "An act for increasing the efficiency of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1899.

Another section in the bill provides how these troops shall be officered through appointments by the President of the United States, and still another provision of the bill says that the men enrolled under section 24 shall not be eligible to belong to the militia organized in the State.

Mr. President, I have read that at length for the purpose of answering the inquiry of the learned Senator from Wisconsin, and by it it will be seen that provision is made for the organization of this force without further legislation. In other words, the act under which the organization is to be made has already been enacted and is upon the statute book, and this act provides that the force shall be organized under that act. So I think that answers the inquiry made by the Senator, if I understood the inquiry correctly. In other words, Mr. President, it is not necessary that there shall be an act passed providing the manner in which this force shall be organized. The act of 1899 is specified as furnishing the machinery under which such organization is to be made without further legislation for that purpose.

But, Mr. President, as I was saying yesterday, the imperfection of the twenty-fourth section of the bill is not a sufficient answer to the objection to it. The fundamental objection which I make to it is this specifically: That it is creating two kinds of citizen soldiery, and that while it was the intention of the framers of the Constitution that the citizen soldiery should be the militia of the country, this divides the citizen soldiery into two distinct classes, one body of which shall be the militia of the country and the other body of which shall be in fact a reserve force of the Regular Army. This last division, citizen soldiery, would be organized and officered by the United States, would not be under State law, and would not be subject to the call of the governor of the State for any purpose.

Mr. President, that is a most serious proposition. The fundamental idea of the framers of the Constitution was that the citizen soldiery should be the militia and that it should not be separated from the control of the States; the fundamental idea was that the great reserve military force of the country should be the militia and that their organization should be under the authority of the States. The fundamental requirement in that regard was that they should be officered by the States, and the reservation to the National Government in regard to the militia is as to their organization, arming, and discipline and management. All that will be necessary to make them perfect as a machine for war is that the discipline, the training, by the States shall be according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

In that way there was answered the great jealousy which existed at that time in the minds of all American people against great standing armies, and at the same time there was answered the necessity for a sufficient force for the protection of the country in time of need. In that way there was answered the additional requirement that there should be at the command of the States a sufficiency of force for their local requirements in time of need; and thus it was that there would be no soldiers in any State other than those who belonged to the regular establishment, which would not be at command of the governor of the State for the preservation of order and for the maintenance of authority.

This bill proposes to erect in every State an organization, if you please—if not a perfect one an imperfect one—of men who shall be citizen soldiery and at the same time shall not be subject to the control of the State. In no manner are they to be subject to the law of the State or to the authority of the governor or made responsive to his call.

Mr. President, I said yesterday, and I repeat it to-day, that this is no legitimate part of this bill. If this force is a part of the militia, section 24 is unconstitutional and all Senators will necessarily admit it, because under it not only is the force officered by the United States, but it prescribes duties which can not be laid upon the militia. It says that they shall be subject to be sent out of the country. If it is not a part of the militia, if it is designed simply to be, which it undoubtedly is, an appendix to the Regular Army, a reserve force to the Regular Army, then it has no place in this bill.

Why is it, Mr. President, that legislation with reference to the Army can not be had without bringing it under a militia bill? We are all of us in favor of an efficient militia bill; we are all of us in favor of an efficient militia organization; we all of us want to cooperate in the laudable effort of the War Department to perfect the most efficient militia bill which can be devised; and I think that great credit is due to the War Department for this bill so far as it relates properly to the militia, and it would be with the greatest pleasure that I should give my vote for it, and I desire to do so. Why is it that a provision which relates to the Regular Army—because it can not be said to be anything else—can not be allowed to stand upon its own merits and pass by its own strength, and that those of us who favor the enactment of an efficient militia law may not be compelled to pass upon a question which does not in any manner relate to the militia, and vote possibly "no" upon a bill which we would otherwise desire to see enacted into law?

Mr. President, this is a most serious departure from anything which has heretofore been attempted with reference to the military establishment of the country. I discussed on yesterday what was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution in the organization of a militia. I discussed what was in their contemplation under the term "militia." I contended that the purpose was to include all citizen soldiery under the term "militia." We must not unnecessarily confuse terms. In the old days we used to recognize the distinction between the militia and the volunteer organizations which had been called in some States National Guards and in other States volunteers, but, in fact, in the broader sense, in the sense in which we are dealing with it here, when we use the term "militia" we mean all the citizen soldiery, all the soldiery outside of the regular establishment of the United States.

The term "militia," in its broader sense, is made to include the volunteer organizations which in some States are known as the National Guard; is made to include those known in other States as volunteer companies, and is made to include also any unorganized militia there may be. I repeat, it is a term used as a broad generic term to include all citizen soldiery, all soldiery other than the Regular Army of the United States and such other organizations as are regularly enlisted in the Army of the United States for active duty.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I suppose the Senator would be willing to admit that in the generic sense it includes all citizens of the States able to bear arms, whether enrolled and organized or not?

Mr. BACON. It would include all between the ages the law designated as subject to military service. Of course, if you go to the strict letter of the term, you know what "militia" means. It means, in a still broader sense, soldiery; it comes from the Latin word "miles," which means a soldier; but we all know what, in the organization of this Government, was intended by the term "militia." It was intended to include all branches and all kinds of citizen soldiery as contradistinguished from the Regular Army, and therefore we find the term in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is in error about that.

Mr. BACON. Well, I should be very glad to be corrected by the honorable Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not mean that I can correct the Senator, but I only suggested that I thought——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will not understand me as criticising him in any way.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, no. I think the word "militia" is a generic word, and I think it includes all citizens of the States capable of bearing arms. The supreme court of Alabama at one time defined it, and there have been various decisions to the same effect. That court said:

> Its true and exact import is that portion of the people who are capable of bearing arms—the arms-bearing population.

That is subdivided into the organized militia. It may be company organization throughout the State, as there was once in my State and in the Senator's State, I suppose——

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Afterwards they organized into battalions, regiments, and brigades, out of which came the National Guard; but in the generic sense in which the term is used, I think this definition by the supreme court of Alabama the correct one.

Mr. BACON. I will not take issue upon that.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator mean to be understood as saying that under the Constitution, in the exercise of the power to raise armies, the force must be either a standing army, a regular establishment, officered, of course, by the President, or the militia officered by the States? Does the Senator mean that?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator please repeat the question?

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator contemplate that when the Constitution confers upon the Congress the power to raise armies limited in this way that it must be the regular establishment of men who serve in time of peace as well as in time of war under orders of the President and officered by the President, or the militia officered by the States? The Senator excludes the power of Congress to bring into the service a force which is neither in fact a part of the standing army nor a part of the organized militia of the States, which are officered by the States, does he not?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, the Senator asks a question and proceeds with such elaboration that it is difficult to answer "yes" or "no."

Mr. SPOONER. I did not ask for a categorical answer.

Mr. BACON. I endeavored on yesterday to explain what my view was about the matter, and I shall endeavor again, in response to the inquiry of the Senator, to make it a little clearer, if I am able to do so.

I think that the contemplation of the Constitution was that the militia should include those who should be recognized as the citizen soldiery of the country. That is what is meant by "militia." As to how many of the population that will include, of course it is not necessary for me to go into the distinction which the Senator has called to our attention. I care not how true it may be; I care not whether the term "militia" is to include all, as stated by the supreme court of Alabama, capable of bearing arms, or whether it includes only such as Congress in an enactment may say it shall include, for instance, in regard to the limitation of age. But there are recognized in the Constitution of the United States two classes of soldiery—those who are in the employ of the National Government and those who are the citizen soldiery capable of being called into service, but who are not in the service until so called. That is the distinction.

The Senator's question, I presume, is meant to direct my attention to the class of organizations which were called out in the Spanish war under the acts of 1898 and 1899. They were not what we call the Regular Army, but nevertheless they were enlisted in the service of the United States Government, receiving its pay, and regularly subject to its orders. They were not men in civil life, still engaged in civil vocations. They had left civil life; they had laid down their civil vocations; they had submitted themselves to the authority and direct control of the United States Government and became part of its active Army.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, when the organized militia are called into the service of the United States they are subject to the orders and discipline of the United States as made by the United States.

Mr. BACON. Undoubtedly, and should be so enrolled. I think that one of the merits of this bill, so far as it relates to the militia, is that it enables the United States Government to receive efficient service from that class of men.

But the point to which I am very glad to have the attention of the learned Senator directed is this: That under section 24 of this bill there are to be men who are not in the service as soldiers, but men who are in civil life, who are still pursuing their civil vocations, who are yet to be enrolled as soldiers of the United States in each State as part of the citizen soldiery, and yet in no way as contemplated by the Constitution, officered by the States, or subject to the laws of the States. They are to be citizen soldiery to be officered by those appointed by the Government of the United States; citizen soldiery not in any manner subject to the law of the State; citizen soldiery in no manner subject to the call of the governor of the State. That is the class of men; and I say it is a class of soldiery which has never heretofore been known to the law of the United States.

Mr. President, I take issue with the proposition which is implied in this bill that the Congress of the United States by the use of words can defeat the evident purpose of the Constitution of the United States, which made the citizen soldiery of the country the militia of the country; which required that they should be officered by the States, and should be subject to the control of the governors of the States until they were called into the service of the United States. If that proposition is correct, to what does it lead? If it be true that by simply calling it something else the citizen soldiery of the country can be taken from without the control of the State, if by simply giving it another name we may have the larger part, or, in fact, nine-tenths of the citizen soldiery taken out of the State militia, the entire purpose of the Constitution can be defeated in that regard, because if by act of Congress a small part of the citizen soldiery can be taken out of the class of the militia, by the same power the larger part of the citizen soldiery can be thus taken out and set apart.

Mr. President, as a corollary of that contention, I deny the proposition that Congress has the power to divide the militia into two classes, and to say that one part of the militia is under the Constitution and the other part of the militia is not that to which the Constitution has reference. That is what this bill does, and I will call attention to the language of it to prove it.

Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] made objection to the bill upon the ground that it made an unconstitutional use of the militia; that it required that a part of the militia be organized in such a way that it could be ordered out of the country, whereas the Constitution provides that the militia shall not be ordered out of the country. Reply was at once made that that particular part of the force upon which that criticism was made was not a part of the militia, and that therefore the constitutional objection did not obtain; and yet I respectfully submit, Mr. President, that this bill does contemplate that it is a part of the militia, and that it intends that there shall be a part of the militia which shall be controlled in the way the Constitution prescribes, and that there shall be another part of the militia which shall be free from the limitations prescribed by the Constitution.

It is not simply that this bill in effect endeavors to make a part of the militia a part of the Regular Army of the United States, the reserve of the Regular Army of the United States, but the bill itself in terms endeavors to divide the militia into two classes of militia—the militia by name—one of which shall be subject to the limitations prescribed by the Constitution and another, which shall be free from it. Have we a right to do that? If I am correct in that statement, if the Constitution says the militia shall be organized so and so, using the generic term "militia," have we the right to say that we will divide the people who are properly included under that generic term, and that one part of them shall be subject as prescribed and required by the Constitution and the other part shall not? Have we any such right? Is there any such power? If we attempt it, is it not an evasion of the Constitution, is it not a violation of it?

Now, am I correct in saying that this bill does that? Let us see. The very first section provides for these two classes of militia in name and in terms and calls them each militia. I will read it:

That the militia shall consist of every able-bodied male citizen of the respective States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, and every able-bodied male of foreign birth who has declared his intention to become a citizen, who is more than 18 and less than 45 years of age, and shall be divided into three classes—

Three classes, now, of the militia. The militia contemplated by the Constitution shall be divided into three classes. That will be all right if each of the three classes is organized in compliance with the plain requirements of the Constitution. I resume the reading:

The organized militia, to be known as the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, or by such other designations as may be given them by the laws of the respective States or Territories, the national volunteer reserve as provided by this act, and the remainder to be known as the reserve militia.

Mr. President, I hope I may have the attention of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on that point, because the Senator himself drew the distinction that this was not a part of the militia, and I have just read the first section of the bill, which says that all of the male inhabitants of the United States between 18 and 45 years of age shall constitute the militia, and that that militia shall be divided into three classes, and thus specifies them, all in one section and in one sentence. These are the three classes: First—

The organized militia, to be known as the National Guard of the State, Territory, or District of Columbia, or by such other designations as may be given them by the laws of the respective States or Territories—

I interpolate the word "second"— the national volunteer reserve as provided by this act—

And now I interpolate the word "third"— and the remainder to be known as the reserve militia.

The second class, as here provided for as part of the militia, and which I have just read, is the class which is created in section 24. It is here in the bill specifically classified as a part of the militia, and yet section 24, relating to the same class, is defended against the charge of unconstitutionality by the contention that it does not relate to a part of the militia.

Now, the point——

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. BACON. I am not going to ask the Senator to answer now, unless he desires to do so, in which case I shall yield to him, but the question I want to ask the Senator is this——

Mr. FORAKER. I do not rise to answer, but only to remind the Senator from Georgia that I said this was not a part of the militia, and that it was not contemplated by the provisions of the bill that it should be, except only as everybody between the ages of 18 and 45 in this country who owes allegiance to the Government is a part of the militia. This is not designed to be a militia organization, but a volunteer reserve force of the Army of the United States, and it is perfectly germane and perfectly proper to be a part of this bill, because this bill relates to the national defense.

Mr. BACON. Nevertheless it is an act which professes to provide for the organization of the militia.

Mr. FORAKER. "And for other purposes."

Mr. BACON. Yes, "and for other purposes." I grant you that. But I am showing what it specifically provides for this particular purpose, if the Senator will pardon me a moment.

Mr. FORAKER. The word "militia" is used, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] suggested, in its generic sense, which covers everybody who is liable to militia duty.

Mr. BACON. Everybody knows——

Mr. FORAKER. Where would he get a volunteer reserve force, if he set about organizing one, except only from the militia?

Mr. SPOONER. Or the Regular Army either.

Mr. FORAKER. Or the Regular Army either.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to their organizing a reserve force of militia if they comply with the requirements of the Constitution in making it a part of the militia.

Mr. FORAKER. Now——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, he asked me a question. Let me reply to it.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to ask another.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but let me get through with one.

There is no objection to there being a reserve of militia. If they will recast the bill so as to make this a part of the militia, subject to the provisions of the Constitution relative to the militia, I have no objection to it, but my criticism upon it is that, while they call it militia, they take it outside of the militia in the fact that they do that which the Constitution says shall not be done in reference to the militia; and, therefore, while the honorable Senators say the militia includes everybody, we know that in the Constitution it does not mean the Regular Army of the United States. If it did, it would not provide that it should be officered by the States.

The Constitution had a specific body of men in view when it used the term "militia" and when it said it should be officered by the States. While it is true that every male citizen between the ages of 18 and 45 is a part of the militia, it did not mean that part of it which we call the Regular Army, because it would be an absurdity to say the officers of the Regular Army should be provided by the States. It meant by the term "militia" the citizen soldiery who were to be called on by the Government in time of emergency, who were still in civil life, who were not enlisted by the United States Government, and who were not organized under its military control and receiving its pay. It meant that great body of citizens who could, when required, be utilized as soldiers and upon whom the great defense of the country must depend—the citizen soldiery.

It said as to them, and put it in the fundamental law of the land, that they should be under the control of the States and that the States should officer them, the President of the United States still having the right to call them directly, without proceeding through the governors. It is not necessary that he should call on the governors. He can call directly for them; they are a part of the citizen soldiery of the country; but while he may call for them directly, the Constitution prescribes that they shall be State organizations, officered by the States, and trained by the States under the discipline prescribed by the United States.

Mr. FORAKER. The further question I wanted to ask the Senator was this: Are not volunteers, when mustered into the service of the United States, a citizen soldiery?

Mr. BACON. They are not then citizen soldiery——

Mr. FORAKER. Were not the volunteers whom we enlisted and sent to the Philippines a citizen soldiery?

Mr. BACON. The Senator asked me a question, and I hope he will let me answer it.

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted to make it more specific.

Mr. BACON. Very well; go ahead.

Mr. FORAKER. I have made it sufficiently specific. Were not the soldiers whom we organized as volunteers and sent to the Philippines a citizen soldiery?

Mr. BACON. That is the Senator's question?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. He simply repeats it without making it more plain.

Mr. FORAKER. I repeat it now, but when I first propounded it to the Senator I did not use the word "Philippines."

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. FORAKER. To make the illustration more direct I repeated it and inserted the word "Philippines."

Mr. BACON. In the sense in which we use the term "citizen soldiery" they were not. The term "citizen soldiery" means those who are still in civil life and yet are subject to be called on for military duty. "Citizen soldiery" we generally understand to be citizens who are organized into military bodies, though in its broadest sense it would apply to all of those in this country who constitute the militia proper, which are all those within the militia ages.

But in the sense of this discussion, whenever an organization is called into active service and comes under the control of the Government of the United States as a part of the Army of the United States they are no longer citizen soldiery. That is not what we mean by "citizen soldiery," and that is not what we have in contemplation when we are discussing this bill; but we have in contemplation, in discussing this bill, the men who are still in the civil walks of life, but who are so organized, if you please, or so embraced in a statute that when war comes they can be made to lay down the vocations of civil life and take up the weapons of war. That is what we mean by "citizen soldiery."

A volunteer company, whether known as a volunteer or as a national guard, so long as it is composed of men who are not in active service, are, in the sense in which we are discussing this question, citizen soldiery. But whenever they are called into active service, whenever they are enlisted and put into organizations under the command and military authority of the Government of the United States, while in the sense which the Senator from Ohio had in view when he propounded the question they might still be called citizen soldiery, they are not the citizen soldiery whom we have in contemplation here, because that is not the kind of people we are talking about. What we are discussing are citizen soldiers who in time of peace will not be in active service, who will not be separate and apart from their fellow-citizens, who will mingle with them every day in their daily civil vocations, but who, when the need comes, can be put into the Army. Those are citizen soldiery; and it was that class of citizen soldiery which is included under the term "militia" which was in the minds of the framers of the Constitution.

Mr. President, the doctrine that there are any rights left to the States is by many no longer recognized, and the suggestion that there is still any right of a State which, under the Constitution, should not be violated by the General Government is, by some at least, only met with a smile. But, sir, there are still rights of the States under the Constitution, and Senators, the peculiar representatives of States, should guard those rights most jealously. The particular right for which we are contending in opposing section 24 of this bill is by the Constitution expressly reserved to the States. A part of section 8, Article I, which I have already read in full, making it the duty of Congress to organize and arm the militia, concludes with the words:

Reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

This bill in so far as it provides for the organization and arming and discipline of the militia is substantially all right and meets my approval. But section 24 violates this provision of the Constitution, as well as others. It takes out a part of the citizen soldiery of a State, provides for their being officered by the United States, and takes them away from the authority and training of the State in which they live, and puts them, so far as military duty is concerned, under the exclusive authority of the President and of Congress. The President of the United States can call on these citizens for military duty, but the governor of the State can not, although riot and insurrection may be at their doors. These men, thus enrolled and set apart, are to be still citizens and civilians in a State, but the governor can not call on them for any military duty whatever, nor can the State, by any law, impose any military duty upon them. They are to be subject to the orders of the President in military matters, but not to the orders of the governor.

The governor of a State is the military head of the State in the same way that the President is the military head of the United States. The duty to preserve order, to put down insurrection, to maintain law, devolves upon the governor in a State in the same manner and even in greater degree than it devolves upon the President in the United States. Every citizen of the State capable of bearing arms and not in the active military service of the United States is, by every principle of our Government, subject to the order of the governor when required to enforce law and maintain authority. It is a violation of this fundamental principle to enact a law by the Federal Government which shall set apart a certain class of the citizens of the State and say that they shall be subject only to the call of the President and to the military duty prescribed by Congress; that they shall not be subject to the call of the governor or to any military duty which may be laid upon them by the legislature of their State.

Mr. CULLOM. May I interrupt the Senator from Georgia for an interrogatory?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to have a brief executive session, and if the Senator from Georgia has not very nearly concluded, I would be glad if he would give way for that purpose. I understand that later in the day a ceremonial is to take place.

Mr. BACON. I do not think I could get through anyhow before the time when those exercises will begin.

Mr. CULLOM. That is the reason why I ventured to interrupt the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. So, if it is entirely agreeable to the Senate and the Senator, I will suspend for the day.

I did not expect to be so long upon the floor, but my distinguished friend the Senator from Vermont in charge of the bill will recognize the fact that inquiries which have been made of me and which I have been most happy to receive and attempt to answer, at least, have necessarily made my remarks much longer than they otherwise would have been. I think it is an extremely important measure. I do not think there has been a more important one before this body since I have been in the Senate, in so far as it opens a new policy for the Government—a policy which in its extension and development may utterly revolutionize the militia system as contemplated by the Constitution.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. Then, by the leave of the Senator from Georgia, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield for that purpose?

Mr. BACON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Illinois, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PUBLIC BUILDING BILLS.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the bills (S. 5655) providing for the erection of a public building at Moberly, Mo.; (S. 5497) to provide for the erection of a public building at the city of Columbia, Mo., and (S. 5288) to limit the cost of the public building at Joplin, Mo., and that they be postponed indefinitely, provision having been made for the erection of public buildings at each of these places.

The motion was agreed to.

SAFETY APPLIANCES ON RAILROADS.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be, and it is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all information and reports furnished by its inspectors showing the condition and defects of train or power brakes, and the operation of trains thereby, as required by the act to promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads, approved March 2, 1893, from May 10 to December 31, 1902, on the following-named railroads and their leased lines: Baltimore and Ohio, Chesapeake and Ohio, Cincinnati, New Orleans and Texas Pacific, Erie, Illinois Central, Lehigh Valley, Louisville and Nashville, Lake Shore and Michigan Southern, New York, New Haven and Hartford, Norfolk and Western, Pennsylvania, Queen and Crescent, Southern, and Southern Pacific.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KEAN. What is the resolution? I did not catch the purport of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a resolution offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON], for which he asks present consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON. If the Senator from New Jersey will permit me to make a very short statement, I think there can be no objection to it.

Mr. KEAN. I will withhold my objection.

Mr. PATTERSON. On the 10th of May last a like resolution was adopted. The Interstate Commerce Commission have not complied with the resolution, but they are almost ready to send in their report. This resolution is supplemental, simply bringing up that information from the 10th of May last to the present time. It will require four or five additional days, if this resolution is adopted, as I am told, to make the information complete.

Mr. KEAN. Why not get the information previously asked for first?

Mr. PATTERSON. This is simply supplemental to it. It is the same class of information, and brings it up from the 10th of May to the present time.

Mr. KEAN. I think the resolution had better go over.

Mr. PATTERSON. It would be all one piece of work.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the present consideration of the resolution, and it goes over.

EFFICIENCY OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible to consider the militia bill further this week, and I give notice that on the first day after the recess I shall call it up in the morning hour. It will retain its place on the Calendar, of course.

MELLERT FOUNDRY AND MACHINE COMPANY.

Mr. PENROSE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (H. R. 2492) to reimburse the Mellert Foundry and Machine Company for money retained by the United States for failure to complete a contract within a specified time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read to the Senate in full for its information.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,427.84 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing the Mellert Foundry and Machine Company, Limited, of Reading, Pa., for money retained as a penalty by the United States by reason of a failure to complete a contract within a specified time.

Mr. SPOONER. What department of the Government, if I may inquire, was this contract made with?

Mr. PENROSE. The report of the committee, which I will have read if the Senator desires, will explain it.

Mr. SPOONER. I only want the information if the Senator has it.

Mr. PENROSE. I do not recall. I introduced a bill similar to this one when I first entered the Senate. I have got it through at every session; and now, at the close of my term, I should like to have it passed. This bill was passed by the House of Representatives at the first session of the present Congress. It has been reported favorably again for the third time by the Senate Committee on Claims, and is now pending on the Calendar.

Mr. SPOONER. What I really wanted to ascertain, and my question was only a preliminary one, was whether the department which made the contract recommends the passage of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. I assume that it does. I have not read the report of the committee for the present session. I would ask to have the report read, but I hesitate to take up the time of the Senate upon a comparatively unimportant matter.

Mr. SPOONER. The sum of money involved is not large, but the precedent is large.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I ask to have the report read.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not care to have the report read in full or to take any time. I should like to know what the bill involves.

Mr. KEAN. I can explain to the Senator from Wisconsin what the claim is. There was a penalty under the contract, which these people paid. The Government suffered no loss, and the object of the bill is merely to remit the penalty.

Mr. FORAKER. For delay?

Mr. KEAN. For delay.

Mr. SPOONER. It is recommended by Brigadier-General Wilson, Chief of Engineers, I observe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House insists upon its amendments to the bill (S. 4850) to increase the pensions of those who have lost limbs in the military or naval service of the United States or are totally disabled in the same, disagreed to by the Senate, agrees to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. CALDERHEAD, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution, and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 15140) providing that the circuit court of appeals of the fifth judicial circuit of the United States shall hold at least one term of said court annually in the city of Fort Worth, in the State of Texas, on the first Monday in November in each year; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 227) to pay the officers and employees of the Senate and House of Representatives their respective salaries for the month of December, 1902, on the 18th day of said month.

ALLEN M. RIPLEY.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, there are two pension bills on the Calendar which I would like to have acted on. The first one is the bill (S. 6330) granting an increase of pension to Allen M. Ripley.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Allen M. Ripley, late of Company K, Fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Heavy Artillery, and to pay him a pension of $30 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NANNIE M. KIMBERLY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3708) granting a pension to Nannie M. Kimberly.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments, in line 7, before the words "United States," to strike out "in the;" and in line 8, after the word "month," to insert "in lieu of that she is now receiving;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Nannie M. Kimberly, widow of Lewis A. Kimberly, late rear-admiral, United States Navy, and pay her a pension at the rate of $50 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting an increase of pension to Nannie M. Kimberly."

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, my colleague, Senator ALGER, is without assignment to any committee, and I understand from the chairman of the committee on committees that there is some difficulty about making an assignment at this time. In view of that, and recognizing his eminent fitness as ex-Secretary of War to serve upon the Committee on Military Affairs, of which I am a member, I ask the Senate that I may be relieved from further service upon that committee that my colleague may be appointed to the place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan asks leave to be relieved from further duty upon the Committee on Military Affairs. Is there objection to his request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I move that the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER] be appointed to fill the vacancy made by the action of the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks that the junior Senator from Michigan be appointed to the Committee on Military Affairs in the place made vacant by the resignation of the senior Senator. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is so ordered.

MEMORIAL ADDRESSES ON THE LATE SENATOR WILLIAM J. SEWELL.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, in pursuance of the notice heretofore given, I submit the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey submits resolutions, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That it is with deep regret and profound sorrow that the Senate hears the announcement of the death of Hon. WILLIAM J. SEWELL, late a Senator from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That the Senate extends to his family and to the people of the State of New Jersey sincere condolence in their bereavement.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the business of the Senate be now suspended to enable his associates to pay fitting tribute to his high character and distinguished services.

Resolved, That the Secretary transmit to the family of the deceased and to the Governor of the State of New Jersey a copy of these resolutions, with the action of the Senate thereon.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That, as an additional mark of respect, at the conclusion of these exercises the Senate do adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senate agree to the resolutions?

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, almost a twelvemonth has rolled away since the mortal remains of General SEWELL were conveyed to their last resting place in the beautiful cemetery of Harleigh, near Camden, N. J., and yet we feel the loss that has befallen his country and his State as if it were but yesterday.

We miss him here—that tall, soldier-like form, which for many years held conspicuous place among us, the friend and colleague to whose memory we pay our tribute to-day.

In his rise from narrow and humble beginning to eminence and leadership General SEWELL exemplified those qualities of mind and heart which we have come to recognize as typical American. Gifted with resolution, patience, firmness, self-reliance, he was destined to master in time whatever task he undertook—to prove his mettle in any field to which duty or opportunity might call him.

Thoroughness, constancy, and loyalty were his watchwords. His success he owed to no caprice of fortune. He won against odds; it was the fruit of struggle and training—of capacity unfolding itself as opportunity came—of that broad and hard experience in which our leaders in war, in politics, and in industry have almost all been bred.

To this school—the school of Clay, of Jackson, of Lincoln, of Grant, of Garfield, of McKinley—WILLIAM J. SEWELL clearly belonged. His leadership was established under the same conditions and through the same qualities.

He was a younger son of a family of yeoman proprietors possessing a freehold in the parish of Sebergham, Cumberland, England. His father obtained a commission in the civil service and went to Castlebar, county of Mayo, Ireland, as "collector of internal revenues" for that county, where he married a daughter of Captain Joyce, of the Fifth Regiment of Irish Dragoon Guards. The Joyce family was of protestant Scotch-Irish descent. Although General SEWELL had but little Irish blood in his veins he cherished the greatest affection for the land of his birth and early associations.

Born in 1835, he was left an orphan at an early age; he followed a brother to the city of New York. As a youth he was adventurous and romantic, and at the age of 18 gave up a good business opening in order to enlist before the mast of an American merchantman, the Flyaway, sailing for Chinese ports. After an adventurous voyage, on which he distinguished himself for courage, he returned to the United States as first mate of that vessel. He engaged in several business undertakings, and when the war broke out he had so many friends he was able to raise a company of his own, with which he enlisted in the Fifth New Jersey Volunteers and became its captain.

He participated in all of the engagements in which the Fifth New Jersey took part, and in July, 1862, was promoted to the lieutenant-colonelcy. He became colonel in September of the same year.

At Chancellorsville he commanded the Second New Jersey Brigade and led a timely and successful charge against the enemy—a piece of soldierly skill and daring which won immediate recognition, and later was awarded a medal of honor by Congress.

Though wounded, he resumed his field duties for the Gettysburg campaign, and on the second day's fight at Gettysburg was in the front line of the Federal left wing so fiercely assaulted by Longstreet. There he again showed the greatest gallantry and was again—and this time more seriously—wounded. From July 2 to August 31, 1864, he was retired for disability. But entering the service afresh as colonel of the Thirty-eighth New Jersey Volunteers, he participated in the wasting Virginia campaign which preceded Lee's surrender.

For meritorious services he received brevets both as brigadier and as major general.

From 1872 to the time of his death he devoted much labor to organizing and strengthening the National Guard of New Jersey, bringing it to a new and highly creditable level of efficiency.

Soon after the outbreak of the war with Spain President McKinley commissioned him a major-general of volunteers. It was his earnest wish to serve his country again in arms, but a higher duty interposed, and at the earnest request of his Republican colleagues in this body he decided to decline the appointment pressed upon him. Many of you will recall the appeal that was made to him not to abandon his seat in the Senate.

"We do this," the letter read, "knowing that the appointment is well merited by your distinguished military career and your genius for organization and command, but we feel in this exigency neither the party nor the country can forego in the Senate the influence of your experience, ability, patriotism, and integrity in legislative service."

The fidelity and capacity he had shown as a soldier were to assure his success in civil life. After being mustered out of the service he wasted no time in seeking employment. The first place that offered was accepted, and, though not a remunerative one, proved to be most fortunate. It was with the Camden and Amboy Railroad, at Trenton. His great executive ability in even minor positions was quickly recognized, and he was sent to Camden as yardmaster. Diligence and competence soon earned him promotion; he rose through the various grades to be general superintendent, vice-president, and finally president of what is now known as the West Jersey and Seashore Railroad Company.

General SEWELL'S active political career began in 1872 with his election to the State senate from Camden County. He served three three-year terms in the senate and was its president while the Republican party had control. He fathered the resolution creating a commission to suggest amendments to the State constitution and led the fight for their adoption. He also took a conspicuous part in the passage of New Jersey's general railroad law and of the railroad municipal tax and municipal corporation acts.

In 1881 he first entered this body, having been chosen to succeed the Hon. Theodore F. Randolph. Six years later he failed of reelection, the legislature having a Democratic majority on joint ballot. But in 1895 he regained his seat, succeeding the Hon. John R. McPherson. In 1901 he was elected for a third term, only a fraction of which he served. His last appearance in this body was at the extraordinary session called by the President which terminated March 9, 1901.

In his own State he long exercised an exceptional influence in party councils. He headed our State delegations to the Republican conventions of 1876, 1880, 1884, 1888, 1892, 1896, and 1900, and was New Jersey's recognized spokesman in all those gatherings. His power in the State organization was sometimes disputed, but never overthrown. On the contrary, it grew with time, for it was based on unquestioned capacity, courage, loyalty, and integrity.

In all the heated and prejudiced struggles of faction no one could justly reproach WILLIAM J. SEWELL with a broken promise or a dishonorable betrayal.

Of his service in this body I need say little. Here, where his character was intimately known, his sterling virtues were amply appreciated. He made few speeches. The part he played was not spectacular.

Yet the work he did was eminently useful and lasting His judgment on all important legislation was sought and valued. He was a tower of strength in counsel. His voice was potent in all decisions on legislative or party policy.

In manner General SEWELL has been charged with a certain brusqueness and coldness. There was a hint of military precision in his attitude. He sometimes carried directness to the point of bluntness, but this manner reflected only his own deeper tendencies of thought and character. He believed in openness, in candor, in plain speaking and straightforward action. He scorned concealment and indirection; and he detested shams and insincerity.

To all who knew him intimately this surface roughness covered a generous and tender heart. Always open, always high minded, he won the ungrudging respect of his opponents, while attaching his friends to him in ever-tightening bonds of trust and love.

> His life was gentle, and the elements
> So mix'd in him, that Nature might stand up
> And say to all the world, "This was a man!"

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, it is eminently fitting that to-day the Senate of the United States of America should lay aside its legislative labors in order to pay its last tribute of respect, friendship, and honor to the memory of Hon. WILLIAM JOYCE SEWELL, late a Senator in this Chamber from the State of New Jersey.

General SEWELL was born December 16, 1835, in Ireland, came to this country at the age of 18 years, and died at his home in Camden, N. J., December 27, 1901, respected, honored, and loved by the good people of his adopted State and by all who knew him personally or knew of his noble, manly character and worth. "A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches."

His life record is a brilliant and illustrious one, worthy of emulation, and inspiring and encouraging to those who closely study it. At the age of 18 years, in this, his adopted country, he entered the arena for his life work with a sound body and a clear, vigorous mind; with honesty of purpose, fidelity in the discharge of every duty and trust, great or small, and firm determination to achieve success honorably and legitimately.

He engaged in mercantile pursuits; and early after the beginning of the civil war in 1861, being loyally and patriotically devoted to his adopted country and the maintenance of the integrity of the Union of the States, he organized a company of volunteers and was commissioned captain in the Fifth New Jersey Regiment on the 28th day of August, 1861, and served during the entire war with distinguished gallantry and military ability.

On July 7, 1862, he was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and in October of the same year to colonel, and participated in the many battles in which his regiment was engaged, and was severely wounded at the battles of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg.

At the battle of Chancellorsville he was commanding the Second New Jersey Brigade and, at a critical position, led forward his brigade in a daring charge and achieved one of the brilliant successes of the war, capturing eight stands of colors. For his gallant and meritorious services in this battle he was commissioned by brevet a brigadier-general of United States Volunteers.

On July 2, 1864, he resigned as colonel on account of the disabilities incurred in the service in the line of duty. As soon as he had partially recovered from the effects of his wounds, he again offered his services to his State, and was commissioned by the governor to raise and organize the Thirty-eighth Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, and was mustered in as colonel October 1, 1864, and with his regiment took an active part in the operations about Petersburg, Va., which resulted in the capture of Richmond, Va., on April 2, 1865, and the surrender of General Lee at Appomattox on April 9, 1865. With his command he returned to his home and was honorably mustered out on June 30, 1865.

For his gallant and meritorious services during the war he was brevetted major-general March 13, 1865. In estimating correctly the gallantry, military abilities, and services shown and rendered by General SEWELL from early in 1861 to the middle of the year 1865, we must not forget the historical fact that that war was a war lasting for four long weary years, wherein the citizen soldiers of the Northern and Southern States of our Union, the noblest and bravest soldiers who ever faced each other in martial array and clashed in mortal combat in all the history of the world's wars, confronted each other, fearlessly contesting every foot of ground and covering the field of battle with dead and wounded on each side. When such soldiers met each other in battle there was truly "the tug of war," testing to the fullest extent their endurance, courage, manhood, and devotion.

It was in such a war that General SEWELL achieved eminent distinction and rendered meritorious services, justly entitling him to the brevets of brigadier-general and major-general, United States Volunteers, conferred upon him by President Lincoln. When the war closed, in the maintenance of the Union of the States, General SEWELL returned to the peaceful avocations of civil life with the same courage, patriotism, and devotion he had so conspicuously shown during the war.

He was that type of American soldier whom his comrades in arms respected, honored, and willingly followed.

In civil life he was that type of American citizen whom his fellow-citizens respected and loved to honor and to follow.

As an officer he was brave, strict in discipline, mindful of the well-being of his men, and inspired them with confidence and courage, and enjoyed their respect and love.

As a citizen, by his forceful character, great executive ability, untiring energy, incorruptible integrity, and strict attention and devotion to duty and to the interests of his fellow-citizens, he inspired their respect, confidence, love, and loyal devotion. He attained the highest honors which his fellow-citizens could confer upon him as an American citizen by adoption and born a foreigner.

He was three times in succession elected a State senator from his home county, Camden, and was president of the senate in 1876–1879 and 1880, when his party was in power, and while a member of his State legislature was elected to the United States Senate in 1881 to succeed Senator Randolph, and served in this Chamber to the expiration of his term in 1887.

Politically General SEWELL was a staunch Republican, and took an active part in all public and political affairs. He was elected a delegate to the Republican national conventions of 1876, 1880, 1884, 1888, 1892, 1896, and 1900, and was made the chairman of his State delegation in each of the conventions.

In 1895 he was again elected to the United States Senate to succeed Senator McPherson, and in 1901 he was reelected for the term beginning March 4, 1901, and ending March 3, 1907.

In addition to the many duties of the official positions he held, he was engaged in and connected with many business enterprises—banks, trust companies, and philanthropic societies.

He took an active interest in the organization of the National Guard of his State and held high positions in that organization, and was the commander at the time of his death.

He was most earnestly interested in the proper management of the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and was vice-president of the Board of Managers. He was emphatically a busy man in the fullest sense of the phrase. His energetic and earnest devotion to his multifarious duties doubtless hastened his untimely death in the meridian of his usefulness and honors.

The respect, the friendship, the love, and devotion of his constituents, neighbors, and associates were made most manifest at his funeral obsequies.

The people en masse turned out to pay their last tribute to his memory. It was a most impressive scene. The religious services were conducted at his residence by Bishop Scarborough, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, of which General SEWELL was a member of the vestry. My acquaintance with him began when he entered the Senate in 1881 and became a member of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Our acquaintance soon ripened into warm personal friendship, which continued to his death. The more I was with him and the more I knew of him the greater were my respect, admiration, and friendship for him.

In his bearing General SEWELL was quiet, reserved, and unassuming, and was cordial and faithful in his friendships.

As a Senator he was faithful, industrious, and useful, and performed his full share of the duties and labors of the Committees on Appropriations and Military Affairs and others of which he was a member. In his death the Senate, his State, and our country have suffered a serious loss. We tender to his bereft family condolence, and point our countrymen to the useful life, the meritorious services, and the illustrious career of WILLIAM J. SEWELL, the citizen, the soldier, the statesman, the patriot, for encouragement, inspiration, and emulation.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] and the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] having detailed at large the military career and the civil service of the late Senator SEWELL, I shall only review them briefly.

My personal acquaintance with General SEWELL began in 1881, when he became a member of the Senate. Prior to that time he was well known to me as a leading citizen of the State of New Jersey and as one of the earnest, active, and influential Republicans of that State. He was widely known as a great and gallant soldier, as a conspicuous member of the New Jersey senate for many years, and as a potential factor in the political and commercial affairs of that State. He had been an important member of two Presidential conventions and had taken an active part in their deliberations; and as a leading Republican he was well known in nearly all the States of the Union. Therefore when he came to the Senate he was by no means a stranger to those then serving in this body, and enough was known of his capabilities to anticipate the value of his service here, for it is a fact that when a Senator is first elected to this body there is as a rule a careful analysis made by Senators of his record in civil or military life, in order that a just estimate may be formed of his prospective value in this Chamber.

After what has been said by the Senators who have preceded me it is not necessary that I should dwell at length upon the active participation of Senator SEWELL in the affairs of the State of New Jersey, upon the great ability displayed by him as a business man in the conduct of large affairs in his State, or upon his distinguished record in the civil war. Because of his special knowledge of military affairs, immediately on his entry into the Senate he was placed upon the important Committee on Military Affairs. During the entire period of his service in this body he remained a member of that committee and participated actively, as those who served with him well know, in the framing of all the legislation considered and promulgated by it. At his death he was the ranking member of that committee next to the chairman. As is well known to us all, he was especially conspicuous in the military legislation made necessary by the war with Spain. His services were so highly appreciated by the President that he tendered him a military command, with the rank of major-general. He was inclined to accept this distinction, but because of his valuable services on the committee and in the Senate at this critical period, at the unanimous request of the Republican Senators then here, he declined the proffered honor.

Owing to the political situation in New Jersey he failed of reelection to the Senate in 1887, though he was the unanimous choice of his party, and his friends made a vigorous effort to secure his reelection. His defeat was occasioned by the legislature being closely divided between the two great political parties. Again, in the winter of 1895, he was the unanimous choice of his party for Senator and was then elected, and reelected in 1901, so that at the time of his death he was on the threshold of his third term in the Senate.

There being a vacancy in the Republican membership of the Committee on Appropriations, Senator SEWELL was appointed a member of that committee in March, 1897, because of his general and special knowledge of matters coming before it, especially because of his long service here, because of his intimate knowledge of all subjects relating to military matters and appropriations for the support of the Army, and also because of his extensive knowledge of all matters connected with the National Homes for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, of the Board of Managers of which, selected by the two Houses of Congress, he was an active member. His sympathy for his comrades in arms and his desire to make these Homes effective for the comfortable support of the veterans admitted to them led him to give particular attention to this subject.

He spent much time in this labor of love, making at least two visits annually to each of the Homes; and during several years he had general charge of one of the most important of them. He made their cause his own, and was so familiar with every detail respecting their wants that his recommendations were, as a rule, followed by the committee and by the Senate. This was because of his special information and experience and the confidence of his associates in his judgment. This was true not only as respects all appropriations involving military affairs, but his views had great weight in the Senate upon all matters which engaged his serious attention. He proved himself a most valuable member of the Committee on Appropriations, giving close attention to the detailed work assigned to him. He was at all times a safe counselor and a wise and judicious legislator.

Whilst an earnest Republican, he often differed with his Republican colleagues upon matters of detail, and on such occasions was resolute and independent in the expression of his opinions in committee and in the Senate. Keen of perception and with a broad and thorough knowledge of affairs, he immediately grasped the essential points of a proposition. He possessed the faculty of rapid deduction; was quick to make up his opinion respecting a question under consideration, and, when made, was slow to surrender his own judgment to others.

Senator SEWELL was a man of comparatively few words. It was generally understood that he said only what he meant and meant always what he said. His opinions were expressed with force and directness and were susceptible of no misinterpretation.

It may be truly said of him that he was a most able, valuable, and useful Senator, not only in the committee room, but on the floor, and was, therefore, of great service to his State and nation. His death is a distinct loss to his country, and is greatly deplored by all those who served with him in this body.

The home life of Senator SEWELL was ideal in its hospitality and surroundings. Socially he was always most agreeable, courteous, and kind to those with whom he came in personal contact. He enjoyed especially the companionship of old comrades and friends and greatly endeared himself to them. For these agreeable personal qualities I became strongly attached to him, and because of them and because of his conspicuous public service and his high character as a citizen and Senator it is fitting that I should take this occasion to pay this brief but imperfect tribute to his memory, having served with him and known him well during all the period of his membership in this body.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, although Senator SEWELL was severely antagonized to my State and the South during the civil war, and was opposed to me in our political affiliations during the period of our service in the Senate, there were many points on which we were in cordial agreement. This is especially true as to almost every question that concerned our relations with foreign countries during our joint service in the Senate.

I have always felt stronger in having the support of his opinion and his wise judgment, which usually amounted to a firm conviction, when any measure was presented that taxed me with perplexing doubts. In this just confidence in his sincerity and wisdom I believe that I only shared the opinion of the entire Senate.

During several years we were closely associated as members of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals.

In the personnel of that committee the majority were Republicans, and, as chairman, I would have had a disagreeable task if any party lines had affected the conduct of its members as to the great and delicate questions confided to the committee by the Senate.

This is a fitting occasion, I think, to say that no body of Senators could have more completely discarded all political influence from their thoughts and actions, or could have devoted their labors to the service of the whole country more impartially, than has been true of that committee in performing the exacting and difficult task assigned to them by the Senate. And I am glad to say, in honor of our departed colleague, that his thoughtful and laborious work on that committee and his wise counsel were among the strongest supports of the supreme duty that Providence has assigned to the United States, of providing a highway for the nations between the great oceans.

He was very proud to be associated with this work, that only the United States can perform, and deserves the highest honors that its final completion will confer upon those who shall accomplish it.

The subject was as broad as the ocean-borne commerce of the whole world, and the naval power of the United States and those intrusted with its exploration were required to proceed with caution, but with bold and fearless step, to reach conclusions that are logically safe and will be practically secure for all time. But this honest and able Senator was equal to the duty and fearless in its discharge. The benefit of his work on that committee will be felt through many ages to come.

In this service and in all else that was confided to him General SEWELL exhibited a mental trait which was a distinguishing characteristic. He always looked within for his convictions and opinions, and outwardly for the facts upon which he based them.

He did not disregard or hold in light esteem the opinions of other men, but his judgment was his own; he borrowed nothing from currents of thought in other minds, and no reflected color of selfishness was permitted to stain the clean record of his final judgments.

He was not aggressive in pressing his opinions on others, but he defended his own convictions with decided firmness.

There was a directness, force, and singleness of purpose in his action in respect of public affairs that engaged his attention, which left no doubt of his sincerity, and a clearness of conception as to his duty, as he understood it, that forced him into open controversy in support of his convictions with fearless intrepidity. It was not his adversary with whom he waged any conflict of debate, but with his adversary's position or the principles he espoused. So that in the fiercest controversy he indulged in no personalities or invectives, and in his most strenuous debates he wounded no man's feelings and never made an enemy. This is a noble trait, a very great mark of true manhood that should characterize the bearing and deportment of an American Senator.

General SEWELL has left with us the memory of a high example in his dignified and honorable course in this Chamber. His Irish blood fed a passionate flame that warmed his heart, quickened his spirit, and drew his affections to high aims and generous actions.

His friendships had the honest and sincere loyalty of love. They were honorable and ennobling, and were never used for convenience or subordinated to personal advantage or unworthy ends.

He was a wealthy and powerful man, but he did not court the favor of the rich or the support of the powerful at any expense whatever to his dignity or his principles.

He never used his wealth or power for the oppression of the weak or the poor, nor did he, with a flaunting display of generosity, graciously condescend to help them. His generous Irish blood gave a natural flow to his sympathies, and he met the poor and the weak with the hand of friendship that was never empty or grudging and very many have grasped it in silent, tearful gratitude.

As a soldier he was even rashly courageous. He did not stop to study strategic arts of war when the enemy was in array against his flag.

His movement was to the front, and he touched elbows with his men as he marched steadily into the deadliest conflict. He did not rejoice in battle, and was not lured by the ambition for victories; but he could not fail to respond to a call of duty because death was reaping its harvests from the field of battle. He was as gallant a soldier as any who fell or any who survived the battle of Chancellorsville, and a higher title to a soldier's chaplet of honor no man can win.

Senator SEWELL left a record here of duty well and faithfully performed that will long be referred to as a marked example of high Senatorial character, and will confer lasting and special honor upon the State of New Jersey.

Mr. CULLOM. Mr. President, with sadness I join with other members of the Senate in paying tribute to the memory of our late colleague, Senator SEWELL.

The majority of the members of this body knew him well. To know him was to admire him. He was a splendid citizen, a gallant soldier, an able statesman. He was a remarkable man, of unusual power and singleness of purpose, open-hearted, outspoken, and never hesitated to condemn what he deemed to be wrong or to approve what he believed to be right.

Senator SEWELL for many years possessed great influence in his State, and was equally great in the Senate and generally in the councils of the nation. He had rare good judgment, which is the one necessary element of success (whatever may be a man's other qualities or acquirements), in the proper discharge of private or public duty.

Mr. President, Senator SEWELL made a splendid reputation in the field as a soldier during the civil war and at home in New Jersey in the management of private business and as the leader of his party for many years before he came to the Senate in 1881. He was a positive man, and did not at any time shrink from any contest. He was an honorable opponent, and when he gave blows he expected and was willing to receive them in return.

Senator SEWELL was not willing to surrender or compromise when he was sure he was right. He was for the right for right's sake. He was a man of energy, and in the business walks of life he was in the habit of doing things, and could see from day to day and week to week that he was accomplishing his purpose.

The business of the Senate, when compared with the large business enterprises with which Senator SEWELL was familiar, moves slowly. After he had been in the Senate a short time he became restless and felt that he was not accomplishing very much, and while chafing under such feeling on one occasion he said to me: "When I was in private life, engaged in business, I felt that I was doing something for my family and the community in which I live; when I was a soldier in the Union Army, I felt that I was helping to save the Union and the flag; but since I have been in the Senate I do not feel that I am doing any good whatever."

However, Senator SEWELL was very soon recognized as one of the strong men in the Senate and found himself sought after and consulted on all difficult and important measures. He did not like to talk, and sometimes seemed weary of long speeches by other Senators. He seldom addressed the Senate, but when he did he had something to say, which he said in the fewest words possible in order to present the facts and make his views plain.

It is said that brevity is the soul of wit. No man ever demonstrated it more perfectly in the Senate.

Mr. President, as a legislator Senator SEWELL did not stop to theorize. He saw the situation and determined upon his duty and with courage performed it. He was the architect of his own fortune. He was, as has been said by the senior Senator from New Jersey, a native of Ireland, but, like thousands of others from that unfortunate island who came to our shores, showed himself, when his adopted country called, ready to offer his life in defense of liberty and the Union.

He cared nothing for show. He believed in plain living. He was a modest man, as most brave men are. His health failed him in the last years of his service here, and while believing that death was "waiting at the door," he struggled on until at last the end came, and he passed away.

Mr. President, it seems to me that I am constantly standing in the shadow of death—death in the family, death in the Senate. No class, age, or rank can long escape the great destroyer.

Senator SEWELL lived in this his adopted country for more than sixty years. He witnessed its growth and prosperity. He took part in that momentous struggle in which the life of the nation was involved. He witnessed in that struggle the downfall of slavery and rejoiced in its disappearance from our fair land. He saw how when the war ended the nation sprang forth as with a bound into new life and wealth and power. He lived to see this country increase in wealth and influence among the nations as no other has done in centuries. What a satisfaction to him to feel in his last days upon earth that he had done his part in maintaining the Union and in consecrating it anew upon the enduring foundations of liberty and equality.

Some one has said that he is great who is what he is from nature and who never reminds us of others. The subject of this memorial service to my mind comes within that definition.

Mr. President, I close what I have to say by stating that I have not known in my experience a more conscientious citizen, soldier, and statesman or better friend than Senator WILLIAM J. SEWELL.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it was my good fortune to sit next to Senator SEWELL in the Military Committee room during the entire time of his service since he last came into the Senate. He was very regular in his attendance at the meetings of the committee; it is needless to say a good worker on all matters of business before us. No man at the table was better equipped than he for the consideration of all questions pertaining to the Army. His eminent service during the civil war, his natural bent for military affairs, his strong judgment and earnest devotion to the good of his country, especially qualified him for the performance of his duties on that committee. And he was resolute and forceful in their discharge. That there was never any doubt as to where he stood on any question, nor that he would stand there to the end, goes without saying. He was sturdy and strong, mentally, physically, and in natural temperament. Courage and constancy were leading traits of his character. These qualities made him a born soldier of the highest type, but not for the tinsel and show of military service. But when the welfare of the country was at stake his intense loyalty was aroused and he was filled with the inspiration of combat. His entire military career was especially creditable, but his great charge at Chancellorsville at the head of the Second New Jersey Brigade, when he captured nine stands of colors, stands out as most glorious, and for this he was awarded a medal of honor. Here he was on the offensive, and his work was dashing and brilliant. But had the occasion arisen for a desperate defense of a position, no soldier would have met the situation better than General SEWELL. He would have stood like a rock. No matter what the odds, surrender would never have occurred to him as a possibility to be considered. Surrender was a word not found in his vocabulary.

In legislation he was wisely conservative, but not retrogressive, and an earnest believer in the future of his country. His judgment on military matters seemed almost intuitive. My seat next to his gave me the benefit of his aside remarks. "That will never do" was a frequent one, when an objectionable measure was brought up. But, though instantaneous in his decision to oppose, he was calm, deliberate, and methodical in acting upon it. And in these asides there was often a vein of rare humor, in which he seldom indulged publicly, but in which his well-rounded character was not deficient, though it might have seemed so to the casual observer. Take him all in all, measure his life and work by our best standards, and there are few who will take rank for sterling manhood, for great endeavor and achievements, for ripe judgment and vigorous common sense, with WILLIAM J. SEWELL.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, in common with his colleagues, I had great respect for Gen. WILLIAM J. SEWELL, of New Jersey, late one of the Senators of that State in this body, and with them I deplore his loss to his State, his country, and the Senate. He was a manly man, of strong convictions and strong sense, and of great activity and usefulness, and he possessed many qualities that attracted the affection of friends and the confidence and respect of all men everywhere. The many positions of responsibility, both of private and public trust, that he held and the acceptable manner in which he discharged them bespoke his great ability and force of character, while the frequency of his election to office, both State and Federal, demonstrated the favorable judgment pronounced upon him by the people of the great and progressive State who knew him best.

New Jersey is a Commonwealth in which the "isms" have found but little entertainment and which deserves the characterization of "conservative" in the best sense of that term. I say in the best sense, because the word "conservative" is often abused and employed as a shelter of indecision, of neutrality, or of time-serving. General SEWELL, like the State which he represented, was conservative in the best and highest sense of that word.

His career was indeed a remarkable one. It was such as could pertain only to an extraordinary man and an extraordinary country. His lines in life and my own were far apart and generally far different. He was born in Ireland; I in the oldest settlement of the English race in America. He was an active man of affairs—merchant, railroad president, and business man; I, a local lawyer. He, in settling in New Jersey at an early day became identified with his adopted State and perforce of his environment was imbued with all the predominant ideas of the Northern people. I, rooted to the soil of my fathers, was by nativity, heredity, education, and environment alike imbued with the ideas that had been born in the birth and has grown with the growth of the pioneers of our race and of our free and independent American institutions. But these things with right-thinking men and with right-feeling men have never been a bar either to admiration or confidence or friendship, and there were many aspects and relations in which we met on most congenial ground.

He had in part represented here one of the old thirteen States that founded this Union and which had many ancient and historic and friendly ties with my own. He was a thoroughgoing and enthusiastic American, and he had been a soldier—a soldier of such qualities as always commands the admiration of all true soldiers. So American was he that there was nothing in his appearance, manner, bearing, language, convictions, or expressions by which anyone would suppose that he was not "to the manner born," and anyone who would utter in his presence a sentiment of patriotism, of principle, or of generosity would be sure to strike a responsive chord in his bosom.

I never knew General SEWELL until I met him here and was never thrown with him in intimate social relation, but I was often brought in personal intercourse and consultation with him in our service in this body, especially pending the Spanish-American war and the legislation therewith connected, when his position as a leading member of the Committee on Military Affairs gave great importance and far-reaching consequence to his labors. Those labors were great, they were valuable, and they were highly distinguished. They were supported by his natural fervent energy, by his familiarity with military affairs, which had been constantly refreshed by his performance of duty in New Jersey as major-general commanding the National Guard of that State. They were also no little aided by his experience in the civil war, where he rose from the rank of captain in the Fifth New Jersey Infantry to be a brigadier-general and then a major-general.

In that war he and I were in opposing armies, which tested each other's steel in more than 600 battles, and some of those battles were among the fiercest, bloodiest, and greatest in soldiership and in generalship alike which are known to human history.

In that war Americans of all sections achieved a respect for each other by those qualities which command and which compel respect and relegated to the rear narrowness and bigotry, to be replaced by confidence and friendship. A most glorious achievement!

General SEWELL wore upon his body the scars of Chancellorsville and Gettysburg and had attached to his name the highest decorations that a brave soldier can win. None respect more such honorable distinctions, won in such manner as he won them, than the men who fought against him, and none can know better than they what they counted for and what they cost him.

For myself, I respected him beyond what those distinctions themselves either expressed or implied, first, because he appeared to me to value them more than he valued the many honors he had attained in political life and more than he valued his manifold successes in business, which had brought him fortune; and, second, because I never heard him say a word or saw him show a sign of prejudice, resentment, or animosity toward the equally brave and patriotic men who had encountered him. On the contrary, I know the fact that he took keen and earnest interest in urging honors for ex-Confederate soldiers who volunteered in the Spanish-American war, and that it gave him profound gratification to see them intrusted with the flag of our country and to show them the fitting distinctions deserved by those who bear it well.

Such things as these betokened to my mind more clearly and more decisively the true soldier and the true patriot than any title or any medal of honor; and I record here, as it were standing by his tomb, the grateful appreciation which I feel and which will be felt not only in the South, but throughout the borders of the Union. My observation and experience alike have taught me that in these respects General SEWELL was like the best and the most of the soldiers of all parts of America. Those who have the rankest and most unbridled tongues have seldom indeed become the heaviest of the burden bearers. Those who have borne the burdens of the battle have shown the least degree of grudge against those who bore such burdens against them; have rarely, indeed, if ever, used belittling terms concerning them, and have always been the readiest, the heartiest, and the most cogent forces of restoration, conciliation, order, peace, and friendship.

In the travail of woman man is born upon the earth. So in the travail of mind is knowledge wrested from ignorance, and in the travail of both body and soul are the nations molded under God's providence and lifted up to higher and purer and better things. The dead soldier and statesman whom we mourn to-day and to whom we say our last farewell bore his part like a true man in the heavy travail of his day and generation; survived to share the joys of victory, to promote and welcome the dawn of a broader and brighter day, to see the new generation come afield "and in mutual well-beseeming ranks march all one way."

And so his life was crowned with such fullness of achievement and satisfaction as should content the reasonable ambition and hope of man. We may rejoice that the infirmities of age had not bereft him of his faculties ere life closed, and that such scenes as those which his heart craved and had yearned for were before his vision. Giving his body to the dust and his memory to his grateful country, we pray that He who alone can heal may heal the wounded hearts of his family and of those who knew him best and loved him most.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if I were asked to name the dominating power in the Senate of the United States, I would say it is the irresistible influence which has come to us as a legacy from former members who have passed away.

Whatever this legislative body has of patriotism, of dignity, of devotion to duty, of methods for the general good, is due in great measure to the ideals established by the illustrious dead whose names have illumined its roll of membership.

And as the list lengthens and there is added to it the names of those with whom we have been in personal touch as friends and colleagues—aye, almost as brothers—we who remain, and upon whom it devolves to pay a word of tribute, are more and more dominated by the dead.

The great orators, the brilliant debaters, the noted statesmen, who have passed away—the Clays, the Websters, the Calhouns of the Senate—have not been the only class of members to bring the Senate to the degree of respect in which it is held as a dignified, orderly, conservative, and patriotic legislative body.

A part, equal perhaps in importance, has been taken by those who have performed their duty as they have found it—men whose days with the schoolmaster were brief, self-taught in the rough school of experience, carrying a commission rather than a diploma, but knowing humanity to its inmost heart, and quick to the needs of the citizenship of the land. Men of this mold have left a potent impress upon the country, upon Congress, and upon those who have succeeded to their place in this body.

Such a man was WILLIAM J. SEWELL, United States Senator from New Jersey from 1881 to 1887 and from 1895 to 1901—our friend and colleague in whose memory we meet to-day to pay what tribute our weak words can bestow upon the record of his life and deeds.

General SEWELL was not an American born; his birthplace was in that land which has given many illustrious statesmen, citizens, and soldiers to this their adopted country. He was not equipped with wealth to start his career, and was forced to fight the battles of life without the aid and support of father and mother, both having died when he was a mere lad. The hard fortunes of the sea first engaged him, and as a boy before the mast he sailed to the then almost unknown shores of the Orient. But hard as these first conditions were, he and not they obtained the mastery, and, starting the voyage as boy, he ended as mate.

The story of his life is a record of success; not success coming by accident, influence of connections or friends, but by his own untiring perseverance, his devotion to duty, his capacity—his genius in fact, for hard work.

In every undertaking of his life, he commenced at the lowermost round of the ladder. When he went to the defense of his adopted country, he offered himself as a private soldier, but there must have been in the face and figure of the handsome, stalwart youth of 25 evidence of the qualities of leadership, for his companions in his company elected him their captain. He was faithful to every trust imposed in him. He was brave in battle. One who has chronicled his military life says:

His charge at Chancellorsville was one of the most brilliant feats of the war and won for him a medal of honor. It was the morning of May 3, 1863, the last of the three days' battle. The Second Brigade of New Jersey had but two hours' sleep during the night. They had formed in fighting line before daybreak and had been under continuous fire for over four hours. Many of their comrades were dead. More lay wounded and dying about them. General Mott had been injured and carried from the field; general Berry had been killed, and the command fell upon Colonel SEWELL.

To the south and in front and to the west and on the right flank were the Confederate troops. They were swarming forward in overwhelming numbers and had seized a hill from which the Federals had been driven and which SEWELL realized must be recovered. With the instincts of a born soldier he rallied his disheartened forces, and seeing them hesitate in the presence of the foe in such overwhelming numbers that it seemed madness to charge he galloped to the front in advance of the brigade until he stood in distinct view of all and then exclaimed: "At least Jerseymen, follow me!" His example was irresistible. With a rush and a cheer the whole line went forward. Up and over the hill they drove the enemy and on the crest of the earthworks planted the regimental colors.

He entered the service a captain and left it a major-general.

After the smoke of battle cleared away, General SEWELL put off the uniform of a soldier and commenced civil life in a humble capacity in his chosen profession of a railroad man. He started as yardmaster and agent and became president. The qualities of leadership, mastery of details, unremitting work, carried him onward from the lowest to the highest place.

We know his life after he became a member of this body. Seemingly austere at times, perhaps, in manner, yet he was the embodiment of kindliness and true courtesy. I had the honor to serve with General SEWELL for over six years as fellow-member of the Committee on Military Affairs and some two years on the Committee on Appropriations, and I learned to know and value his worth as a man, as a legislator, as a friend. My association with him brings to mind—

> That best portion of a good man's life—
> His little, nameless, unremembered acts
> Of kindness and of love.

He let no day close without doing good deeds for his friends, for his colleagues, for his constituents; and it was with profound sorrow that the fatal tidings came that his work was done.

I recall the active interest taken by General SEWELL in legislation for increasing the efficiency of the National Guard. He was an example of what can be accomplished in war by the citizen-soldier, and it was his constant desire to upbuild and improve the National Guard service of the country in order that it might become a bulwark of defense to our institutions.

It was said by a former member of this body that "a reformer and his reform rarely succeed at the same time." To-day, as we pay our meed of praise to our departed colleague, the reform for which he strove so long and well is about to become ingrafted in the law of the land. While he did not live to see his wishes consummated, we know that his ideas have taken shape and form, and that to his work and energies we owe light and wisdom with which to act in the consideration of the measure which carries into effect his ideas.

While striving to benefit the National Guard of the country, in which he took so great an interest, he never lost sight of the old soldiers with whom he served, and the duties he performed as a member, vice-president, and president of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers served to ameliorate the hardships of many of his old comrades.

And so ran the story of his life. As a boy meeting cheerfully the obstacles which poverty placed in his path; as a youth taking up the hardships of the camp and field, braving the perils of the fiercest battles of the civil war, and winning for himself imperishable fame in the annals of that great conflict; as a business man, gaining the respect and confidence of a great State; as a legislator, true to his constituents, his friends, and his country; and in all, in youth and manhood, in war and peace, in his private and public life, living close to the highest ideals of human life.

Thus he won success—nay, he did more, he deserved success.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I always entertained sentiments of the highest regard and esteem for our late colleague, General SEWELL, in my acquaintance and friendship with him, extending over many years before I came to this body, and these sentiments were intensified by the more intimate associations which I formed with him in the Senate. I sat next to him in this Chamber. We resided in adjoining cities and represented adjoining States which have many common interests. I had many opportunities to observe the strength and greatness of his character and to fully appreciate the loss which we have sustained in his death.

The career of General SEWELL was distinguished by splendid achievements; it affords an inspiration to any young man and illustrates the opportunities of our American Republic. What he accomplished was not the result entirely of good fortune, but the rounding out of earnest, intelligent, and persistent effort. He was born in Ireland, of a respectable family in moderate circumstances, being English upon his father's side and Scotch-Irish upon his mother's. The original coat of arms of the Sewell family was first conveyed upon one of the line for gallantry at the battle of Crecy in defense of the Black Prince, and to this was added later the crest "a mailed hand brandishing a cap of liberty," a republican emblem that could only have been won by resistance to kings.

He left home at the age of 16 to better his fortunes and to create a career. Joining an elder brother in New York in a mercantile capacity, he soon afterwards became a sailor before the mast, and made a number of voyages in various directions, finally becoming second mate by his indomitable energy and forceful will. Late in the fifties he was found in Illinois occupying the position of what might be termed a soliciting salesman, traveling the prairies seeking business for the house which he represented. It was then that he heard the noted debates between Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Douglas, which made a profound impression upon him, and tended largely to his adherence to the Republican party in late years.

By chance being in New Jersey when the war commenced, his naturally martial spirit and his devotion to his adopted country induced him to apply to the governor of the State, Dr. Newell, for the position of second lieutenant in one of the regiments of that State. Governor Newell was so much impressed with his appearance and his decided expression of views as to the conduct of the war that he appointed him a captain. Entering as a captain, he retired at the end of the war brevet major-general. Upon many a battlefield he attested his gallantry and military prowess, notably at Chancellorsville, where he led the New Jersey brigade and recaptured from the Confederate forces a number of Union standards.

At the end of the war he found himself without any special friends in the East, with no money accumulated, and no profession upon which to depend. Happening to be in New Jersey, he entered the service of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company in a minor capacity, and remained continuously with that great corporation until the time of his death, becoming finally president of its lines in New Jersey. As a railroad official the same attributes characterized him as marked his military career. He was fearless in the discharge of duty, quick to grasp an opportunity to better the road which he represented, and singularly fortunate in inspiring absolute loyalty and implicit confidence in both his associates and subordinates.

Having settled in Camden, N. J., General SEWELL turned his attention to politics, and was soon elected to the State senate, where he served for a number of years, some time as president. In 1881 he was elected to the United States Senate, defeating for the nomination such distinguished Republicans as George A. Halsey, George M. Robeson, and William Walter Phelps. At the expiration of his term, the State having become Democratic, he retired to private life. It was thought at that time that New Jersey was hopelessly Democratic and the prospect of Republican success very remote. Here it was that he exhibited that wonderful sagacity in political as in other affairs which distinguished him throughout life. Almost unaided he kept up the organization in his State with such perfection that in 1895 he was again elected to the United States Senate, and, at the expiration of his term, was reelected for the term expiring March 4, 1907.

Among the many admirable traits in General SEWELL'S character several stood out preeminently. His modesty was evident. No one, however intimate with him, ever heard him boast or refer, even in the most indirect manner, to his achievements during the war or in the great and important political events in which he had participated in civil life; in fact, he seemed to deprecate any personal allusion to himself, and when there was any praise to be awarded he was sincerely desirous that others should be the recipients rather than himself. He was preeminently noted for the inviolability of his word. The old saying, "His word is as good as his bond," applied with singular force to General SEWELL, and in his case could even have been enlarged, for his word was better than his bond. He was not a man profuse in protestations, neither did he make a promise nor incur an obligation without giving due consideration to what was involved, and whenever he said he would or would not do a thing, there was no retraction or reluctance, no compromise. He absolutely fulfilled what he had undertaken, so that in his own State political friend and foe alike fully realized that in dealing with him there was nothing held back, there were no unfair surprises intended, but from the first his course was marked with fairness and candor.

He exhibited a remarkable loyalty to his friends. No man ever lived who was more thoroughly devoted to his friends or truer to their interests. His friends did not embrace an army, and he was careful as to whom he placed upon his list or brought near to his heart, but he could not be shaken when once his friendship and confidence had been acquired by anyone. If he erred at all, it was in his steadfast allegiance, unwilling to see things which with other men might have weakened the association. No slander, no innuendo, no attempt to depreciate or injure anyone who was upon terms of friendship or intimacy with him had the slightest effect.

He possessed keen discernment. Few men have excelled General SEWELL in the extraordinary faculty which he possessed for picking out the right person for the work he had in charge. Without this faculty he could have hardly accomplished his achievements as head of great corporate interests and as the recognized leader of a great political organization in one of the great States of the Union. He seemed to know by intuition exactly how to develop the best in a man, to discern what he was fitted for, and to realize his capabilities, influences, and aptitudes. Intrusted as he was with responsibilities which would have appalled almost anyone, he was able to bring about wonderful results, because surrounded by a staff of efficient assistants who took their instructions from him, followed them faithfully, and never betrayed in the slightest degree the faith reposed in them.

He possessed great industry. It was General SEWELL'S habit never to leave his office until he had disposed of every matter that could be attended to that day. His thoroughness in the dispatch of business was one of the secrets of his success. No detail, however insignificant, escaped his attention; no request, however unimportant, was not promptly acted upon; no person ever sought an interview upon a proper mission and was refused; no letter worthy of an answer remained unresponded to.

General SEWELL possessed great breadth of view. He was a reticent man. He was a clear and forceful speaker, without pretending to be an orator. In private life, was not wont to engage in much conversation. His was a reflective and absorbing mind, always anxious for information, never conceited as to his own opinion, willing to be advised if he thought the advice judicious, and capable of grasping a situation, both as to its strong and weak points, almost instantly, which would have required from most men considerable time for reflection. His career in the Senate illustrates his character. There was scarcely a question presented to the Senate during the thirteen years that he was a member upon which he did not from the first reach a correct conclusion.

He was loyal to his country, a loving and devoted husband and father, steadfast to his friends, and faithful to every trust confided to him. As a citizen, soldier, and statesman his career was marked by loyalty to truth and principle. His name will have a bright and honored place in the history of our country.

Mr. DEPEW. Mr. President, it was my privilege to know Senator WILLIAM J. SEWELL for more than a quarter of a century. He and I, during the whole of that period, were in the same profession. It brought us close together in the intimacy of antagonisms and of friendships. Our acquaintance, our intercourse ripened into the warmest friendship, and the more years I knew him the more I appreciated the qualities of mind and of heart which enabled him to accomplish the career which we celebrate here to-day.

I know of no example at this particular period which is so rich in encouragement as that of Senator SEWELL. Extremes always go together, and we are just now, more than at any other age, at the extremes of optimism and pessimism. There never was a time when for an American there was so much to be proud of, and to be hopeful for, and to inspire ambition, as now. And there never has been a time when from the professor's chair to the pulpit, from the pulpit to the press, from the press to the platform, and from every public source, there were so many and such unanimous expressions in regard to the failure of our institutions from now on to permit the development of the individual. There is the universal cry everywhere that these combinations which are forming from the natural tendencies of our age, both of capital on the one side and of labor on the other, are every day wiping out the unit and recognizing only the mass.

It is the glory of our country that it has been builded upon the individual; that under our institutions, differing from all others of all other lands and of all times, it makes no difference what may be the start that the boy has in life, if he has in him the making of a career, the circumstances, conditions, environments, and institutions enable him to make it to the limit of his capacity.

But we are told now that that element in our institutions has been negatived by the character of our industrial and financial development; that it is the corporation, it is the great organization of the trust, it is the mighty combination of labor which have wiped out the foundations upon which we have builded and that which is the hope of the future of the Republic of the United States. So says the lecturer, so says the professor, so says the theorist, so says the agitator, so says the demagogue.

Now, here we have in the career of our friend the best answer I have ever known to just that question. He arrived in this country and started handicapped, as our American youth are not. All the great successes in our financial, our industrial, and our public life have been made by those who started with nothing, with no equipment except brains, character, industry, and ambition. But they were American citizens with all that that means. However, here was a foreign lad with none of those influences of family to which he could go for advice, and none of those influences of environment of the village or the hamlet or the county which would be proud of him and push him forward. Notwithstanding that, you have heard here in these various eulogies what he accomplished, and still did not live to the full period allotted to man.

He began as a poor boy without a penny and accumulated a fortune. He began in public life simply as a worker in the ranks of his party and reached the highest position that his country can give to one born upon a foreign soil. A member of the senate of his State, elected the president of the senate of his State by his associates, after he had been there two terms and he was entering upon his third, he was elected to the United States Senate and chosen for three terms. Starting as a soldier in the humblest position as an officer, by gallantry he retired a brigadier-general, and was then brevetted a major-general for gallantry in the field. Commencing in the humblest capacity in the railway in which he worked for nearly forty years, he became the president of all its lines in the State in which he resided.

Now, there is another element which is a refutal of these pessimistic views. He began his career in the corporation, in which the individual is eliminated, and all private views, private character, private ambitions, and private ability are reduced to the general mass, says the theorist. And yet it was in that career, which occupied the whole of his active life, in the service of one of the greatest corporations in this country that he achieved in finance a success, in public life a success, in his profession a success, as a soldier a success, in any one of which any man would have been said by his neighbors and his family to have accomplished an honorable and distinguished career.

If I may be permitted, as the trend of discussion has gone principally upon what he achieved, I think that his success was due to the directness and the courage which he had. The courage which he displayed upon the battlefield was the courage which was displayed by millions of his fellow-citizens who served under the one flag or the other during the civil war. But he had a higher courage than that mere physical courage, which is admirable, but with which our race is gifted. He had a moral courage, and to that he owed the major part of his success.

During the period when he was most active in politics, when he was most ambitious for popular favor, there prevailed through this country that singular craze and prejudice which said that the million of men engaged in the profession of railroading were unworthy of public confidence, and were dangerous to nominate for public office. There were times when this rose so high that, while both parties wished the services of the railway man after the nominations were made, neither party dared nominate a man upon the pay roll of a railroad company for a village, a county, a State, or a national office.

Many who had ambitions at that period sought to gratify their ambitions by denying the profession in which they were engaged or minimizing it; but Senator SEWELL always remembered that he was one of a million men engaged in a profession which required as much, at least, if not more, of ability, of intelligence, of sobriety, of industry, of fidelity, and all the qualities that go to make up good service and good citizenship, than any other pursuit in the country. He remembered the camaraderie that he had with these men, and he was determined that by no act of his should there be a slur cast upon this profession that they were unworthy of public confidence compared with those who were engaged in other gainful and in other reputable pursuits in our country.

It was the peculiarity of this craze, of this prejudice, that it applied only to those who were on the pay roll and receiving their stipend—salary, wages, whatever it might be—in the regular way from the treasury of the corporation. During the whole of that period the president or the general counsel could retain distinguished lawyers who would receive as compensation many times what the officer or the general counsel had in the way of salary, who would appear in the State and in the national courts, and sometimes when the Government and the corporation were in antagonism, and yet that politician becoming a statesman, or one at the time, could appear in this capacity, and then upon the platform or in Congress denounce the corporation and retain the confidence of his fellow-citizens.

I remember an incident at a national convention where SEWELL and I were frequently in consultation upon this subject and in which I was personally interested, where a gentleman distinguished in his State and in the nation came to me and said, "You should retire instantly, for the sake of your party, from the position in which your State put you as its candidate for President, because in our State we have educated the people to believe that anyone who holds any position under a railroad, whether it is a brakeman, a conductor, a locomotive engineer, a freight man, a passenger man, a president, or a general counsel, is unworthy of public confidence." I said, "My friend, what do you do?" "Well," he said, "outside of my public life—I am so engaged and engrossed in public duties that it is impossible for me to take private practice, and so my entire living comes from the retainers given me by a leading Western railroad."

Now, Mr. President, Mr. SEWELL was no such man as that. When he ran for the State senate first, and again and again, he was the leading railway officer and the representative of all the railroads in his State, and he made no concealment of the fact. On the contrary, while he did not run as such, he did run asserting, "I am as worthy, if as a man and a citizen you think me so, as you, gentlemen, who are engaged in any other pursuit, avocation, or profession." And that courage elected him. It reelected him. It reelected him. It made him the leader of his party in his State. It did more. It made his State, which has always been freer from prejudice than most of the Commonwealths, choose him the leader of the delegation in six national conventions, where he was to be a great force in saying who should receive the nomination for the Presidency and Vice-Presidency, when upon that nomination and upon that platform depended the fortunes of the party to which he belonged.

When in public life he illustrated that he could be a railway man in his profession and a public man when intrusted by the people with office. To his initiative, to his skill as a business man, and to his lack of prejudice on all questions is due that legislation in the State of New Jersey by which taxation has been lifted, so far as State taxation is concerned, from the farm, from industries, and from labor, and placed upon the corporations. He perfected that system so that from the corporation and not from the farm, not from industries, not from labor, comes in the State treasury of New Jersey to-day revenues which have relieved it of State debt, revenues which pay the whole of its State taxation, revenues which take care of its educational system, and revenues which seem as though they would ultimately wipe out local taxation.
